

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

LAWYERS' REPORTS,

ANNOTATED.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Elizabeth VAN AUKEN

CHICAGO & WEST MICHIGAN R. CO.,

(96 Mich. 307.)

1. A traveler is not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law at least in failing to anticipate and guard against the running of a train in a dark night without any headlight, so as to defeat a recovery for injuries in being struck by an engine running backward at a railroad crossing, although there was a failure to stop and listen before endeavoring to cross the track.

2. It is not error to direct the jury as to an answer to a special interrogatory, where the evidence is all one way; and a party cannot complain of such direction because he wants to know whether the jury are making their findings from the facts in accordance with the evidence.

3. Riding home from a railroad station in a peaceable and quiet manner on Sabbath evening is not such a violation of the statute against labor, sport, games, etc., on that day as will defeat a right to recover for injuries received from a train at a railway crossing.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Van Buren County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.
Messrs. Smiley, Smith & Stevens, for plaintiff in error:

If several of plaintiff's witnesses with no better opportunities for hearing, and less motive, than plaintiff, all heard the train passing over the bridges, and if the plaintiff and her three companions all had good hearing, and if they were looking and listening for an approaching train, as the law requires, is not the conclusion inevitable, that plaintiff would have heard the rumbling of the train as it passed over the bridges less than two minutes before the accident?

See Brady v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 81 Mich. 616; Matta v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co., 69 Mich. 109; Haas v. Grand Rapids & L. R. Co., 47 Mich. 406; Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 64 Mich. 100.

There are several objects in submitting special questions of fact to the jury.

Suppose the jury in this case had been permitted to answer this fourth question and had answered it in the negative, or suppose they had answered the first question in the negative, would it not have been clear that the jury were not regarding the evidence at all? And had the court any right to deprive the defendant of this test?

Cavanaugh went to plaintiff's house on business at the time of the accident. The others seem to have been bent on pleasure only, and the statutes of the state and the authorities upon the subject are to the effect that one who is engaging in matters that are not allowed by statute on Sunday cannot recover for injuries that they may suffer while so engaged.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 374, and in numerous other cases decided

NOTE.—The above case brings out a new application of the right to rely upon the performance of duty by a railroad company in giving warning of the approach of trains to a crossing, as affecting contributory negligence of a person at the crossing. For somewhat similar applications of this rule, see Lyman v. Boston & M. R. (N. H.), 11 L. R. A. 364; Hendrickson v. Great Northern R. Co. (Minn.), 16 L. R. A. 361; somewhat in conflict with which is Cincinnati, L. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Howard (Ind.), 8 L. R. A. 598.

As to reliance of traveler upon watchman at 22 L. R. A.

As to violation of Sunday law as a defense, see also Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Buck (Ind.), 2 L. R. A. 520 and note; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Trautwein (N. J.), 7 L. R. A. 435.

by this court, it has been held that a railroad track is itself a warning of danger to those about to go upon it, and that persons about to cross it are bound to recognize the danger, and to make use of the sense of hearing as well as of sight, and if either cannot be rendered available, the obligation to use the other is the stronger.

See Brady v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. and Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. supra.

Although a person who seeks damages in this class of cases swears that he looked and listened and did not see or hear a train that was actually approaching and which caused him injury, yet where the facts and circumstances completely negative the truth of what he says in that regard, this court will not say that it was a question of fact for the jury, merely because he swore to it, but will pronounce his statements false and direct a verdict accordingly.

Mahlen v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 49 Mich. 589; French v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 89 Mich. 537; Marion County Comrs. v. Clark, 94 U. S. 284, 24 L. ed. 62; Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 482, 27 L. ed. 1006; Metropolitan R. Co. v. Jackson, 3 App. Cas. 198.

Had the plaintiff's driver stopped his team when he was fifty feet away from the track, he could not have failed to have seen or heard the approaching train.

Freeman v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 3 L. R. A. 594, 74 Mich. 95.

On petition for rehearing.

The court should hold, and it is the only sensible thing to hold, that every person who crosses a railroad track should be held to great care and caution; and if this rule is firmly held and applied, there will be, upon the whole, a great saving of life by the adjudication.

Stubley v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 1 Exch. 17.

Defendant's negligence cannot excuse the plaintiff's negligence.

Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274.

The only testimony which shows the slightest care on the part of the plaintiff, was that of one of her companions, who says that she looked and "apparently listened." Is this such care as the law requires? Or sufficient to shift the burden of responsibility upon the defendant in this case?

Horn v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 54 Fed. Rep. 801.

A railroad is a place of danger and warning in itself; the duty to stop and listen, which plaintiff did not do, is supported by the following cases:

Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, supra; Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 64 Mich. 93; Brady v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. 81 Mich. 616; Grostick v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 90 Mich. 594; Apsey v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 83 Mich. 432; Pzolla v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 54 Mich. 278; Matta v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 69 Mich. 109; *Haas v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Messrs. George W. Merriman and Boudeman & Adams, for defendant in error:

The object of the blowing of the whistle and the ringing of the bell is to warn people who cross the railroad track that a train is approaching, and for this reason the signal should be made at such a reasonable distance as would fairly notify people who are about to cross the track of the approach of a train.

The trial court is justified in taking the case from the jury because of plaintiff's contributory negligence only when the proof is so clear against the plaintiff as to warrant no other inference, and where the whole evidence is susceptible of but one opinion.

Detroit & M. R. Co. v. VanSteinburg, Teipel v. Hilsendegen, and Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. supra.

The question of whether a person is in the exercise of ordinary care need not to be made out by direct evidence; if the occurrence itself and the surrounding circumstances, after due allowance for conflicting considerations, were capable of breeding an inference of it, and a jury might draw it in the proper exercise of their function, it was sufficient.

Billings v. Breinig, supra.

It is not the province of the court to pass upon the weight of the evidence.

The taking of the case from the jury can only be authorized upon the strongest case made by any of the witnesses.

Marcott v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. 47 Mich. 7; Harris v. Clinton Twp. 64 Mich. 452; Little v. Street R. Co. of Grand Rapids, 78 Mich. 207; Breckenfelder v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 79 Mich. 563.

Negligence cannot be conclusively established by a state of facts upon which fair-minded men may differ.

Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 99; Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 424; Luke v. Wheat Min. Co. 71 Mich. 364; Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co. 78 Mich. 271; *Breeze v. What is required in these cases is reasonable prudence, and a person is only required to take such precautions as a reasonably prudent man would under all the circumstances take.

Cooper v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 66 Mich. 266; Breckenfelder v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 79 Mich. 563; Helbig v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 85 Mich. 359; Richmond v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 87 Mich. 380.

Where a railroad company omits its duty and a person is injured thereby, although the injured person may by his own acts or omissions induced by the negligence of the company, have been guilty of some fault which contributed to the injury complained of, such fault ought not to be permitted to avail the company in making defense against the wrongful act unless it was willful or so gross as to make it equally inexcusable.

It is not simply the statutory signals which are at all times necessarily sufficient. Although the statute does not require head-light or other sufficient light to be placed in front of an approaching train at night, yet we know that it is the custom of all well-regulated railroad companies to have such a light upon their trains; and a person traveling at night has a right to expect that this customary regulation will be observed.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question of most importance involved in this case is that of the contributory negligence of the driver of plaintiff's vehicle when they approached the crossing where the accident occurred. The scene of the accident is indicated by the diagram appended to the opinion of Mr. Justice Grant. The highway and the railroad do not meet at right angles, so that in traveling from the west towards the railway track the view would not be directly in the face of an approaching train. The night when the injury occurred was very dark. The evidence shows that when approaching the crossing the horses were on a walk. No stop was made for the purpose of listening, but the driver and those in the vehicle testified that they looked for an approaching train, but saw none, and that they listened and did not hear any signal. The engine was running backward, and the testimony is conflicting as to whether there was any light at the rear end of the cab. The question presented is whether it was the duty of the driver, under the circumstances, to bring his team to a stop in order to listen for an approaching train. Our decisions have settled the law as follows: First. A railroad track is, in and of itself, a warning of danger, calling upon one about to cross to use his senses, and to look and listen for approaching trains. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274. Second. It is not incumbent in all cases for the driver to stop his team, if the track is clear, and he can safely rely on his sense of sight. Guggenheim v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 66 Mich. 158; Thomas v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 86 Mich. 504; Richmond v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 87 Mich. 380. Third. As to whether, in a particular case, the driver is justified in relying upon his sense of sight alone, must, we take it, depend upon the circumstances of the case presented. No case precisely analogous to the one under consideration has been decided by this court. In Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 64 Mich. 98, it appeared that on a dark and stormy night the deceased was killed while crossing the track, under circumstances which showed conclusively the negligence of the railroad company; that he was acquainted with the railroad crossing at the street in question; that he walked at a rapid pace towards and upon the railroad track, without checking his speed, or stopping or looking or listening, or taking any precaution whatever, to ascertain whether a train was about to pass; that others who were about to cross, whose opportunities for observation were no better than those of deceased, saw and heard the train. Mr. Justice Champlin, in rendering the opinion of the court, said: "Ordinary care would have required him to at least look up and down the track before crossing; and if the night was so dark as to make it difficult to distinguish a train approaching, then ordinary care would have called upon him to resort to his sense of hearing, and to pause and listen before entering upon the place of danger." In Brady v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 81 Mich. 616, it appears that the driver of the vehicle was familiar with the crossing; that the railroad track, for some distance before crossing the highway, runs through an orchard; that the trees coming near the surface of the ground, together with other trees and bushes there, partly obscured the view of persons going southward of any train going to the southeast. The track crossed the highway obliquely. The track extends from north to south, and the highway runs in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction. It appeared that the plaintiff, sitting on the hounds of his wagon between the two hind wheels, drove upon the track without stopping, although he testified that he looked in both directions. The court held as matter of law that he was guilty of contributory negligence. In the opinion Mr. Justice Long states: "The circumstances stated by the plaintiff showed conclusively that he was not using ordinary care in approaching the crossing. Here was a crossing so much obstructed by intervening objects that, according to his testimony, he could not see a train coming from that direction—riding, as he was, upon the hounds of his wagon—until he was within 20 or 25 feet of the crossing, and then only a little distance up the track,—some few rods. He was riding with his back turned in the direction from which the train was approaching, and he knew that it was about time for its approach; and yet he drove along and upon the track without stopping; and even when his horse halted on reaching the track he urged her forward with the lines. . . . It was shown further that there was a mill near the crossing, which was in operation, and creating some noise and confusion. Others standing near there saw the train approaching, and had heard the sounding of the whistle at the crossing above.

Some of them attempted to call the attention of the plaintiff to the train's approach, but were unable to do so, as he appeared to take no note of what was passing. As the facts are presented by this record, it was the duty of the plaintiff to have stopped his team, and to have taken some precaution to ascertain if the train was approaching, which he knew was about due." And further, it was said: "A greater duty was imposed upon the plaintiff in the present case by the fact that he knew the crossing to be a dangerous one. He knew its condition, and that he would be unable to see the train until arriving at the crossing. He had no right to close his ears, and drive along without stopping, when he must have known that the noise of his wagon and of the mill would shut off the sound from the approaching train." In the present case there was no obstruction other than the darkness, which, of course, would not have prevented the plaintiff and her companions from seeing a headlight. The sense of sight was therefore as safe a guide as in the daytime, unless it be held that travelers are guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in not anticipating that trains will be run in the open country without headlights. We think the law ought not to be so. It is most unusual and extraordinary for this to occur. And we think it should be at least a question for the jury as to whether a traveler is in fault in failing to anticipate and guard against such an unusual thing as the running of a train without a headlight. The case might be different in a yard where switching is done, and where cars are switched in the night-time without the use of a headlight, as was the fact in the Myaning Case.

Exception is taken to the language of the court in that portion of the charge where it is said: "The blowing of the whistle and the ringing of the bell a mile away from the crossing would, of course, give no warning to people about to cross the railroad track." The court added this: "The object of it is to warn people about to cross the railway track that a train is approaching, so that the warning should be given within such a reasonable distance as would fairly notify people who are about to cross the track of the approach of the train." We think there was no error in this part of the charge, when read in connection with the whole charge, and when it is considered in the light of the request of defendant's counsel which had been given by the court immediately preceding, as follows: "The law requires of a railroad company that it cause the whistle to be blown not less than forty rods from the crossing. It is not required to be blown within forty rods of the crossing, nor within any other distance except a reasonable distance." The court added to this: "The law does not require the whistle to be blown within forty rods, nor does it specify the exact distance at which the whistle shall be blown and the train hands begin ringing the bell. That distance, however, should be a reasonable one. It must be more than forty rods, but it must be a reasonable distance." It must be remembered that preceding this charge the court had already directed the jury that, if the whistle had been sounded at St. John's crossing, and the plaintiff and her party could have heard it by remaining quiet and listening, and they were at such a point that it was their duty to remain quiet and listen at the time, they would be guilty of contributory negligence if they did not hear it. It is evident from this that the court was calling the attention of the jury merely to what would be a reasonable distance under the statute which requires the whistle to be sounded. We see no error in that part of the charge.

Counsel for defendant requested the court to charge as follows: "It does not appear from the testimony of the plaintiff herself that she looked and listened for a coming train when the vehicle in which she was riding was approaching the track; and, as she was more familiar with the locality than her driver, and as she has the burden of proving her personal freedom from contributory negligence, and as she was bound herself to look and listen for a coming train, she has not shown her personal freedom from contributory negligence, and she cannot recover in this action." The plaintiff was called as a witness, and testified that she could remember nothing except going to Hartford and starting homeward. She was injured in her back, and her limbs paralyzed so that she was unable to walk, and a great share of the time since the injury she had been entirely helpless. The last recollection, she testifies, she has was the party leaving Hartford going towards home, and that it was a dark night. The witnesses called in her behalf, who were her companions in the buggy in which she was riding, however, testified that before they reached the crossing, and at some point which is not very definitely fixed, the plaintiff did look and was apparently listening to see if she could hear the approach of a train. We think there was some evidence from these witnesses proper to be submitted to the jury upon the question of her due care in approaching the crossing, and that the jury, under the general charge of the court, were fully and fairly instructed upon this branch of the case, and the rights of the defendant fully guarded.

Counsel for defendant requested the court to submit the following special questions of fact to be found by the jury: (1) Did the train in question make a rumbling noise as it passed over the bridges before reaching the place of the accident? (2) If the driver, Cavanaugh, had been listening for the coming train as he drove towards the track, could he have heard the train in question as it crossed the bridges? (3) Was there any noise which prevented plaintiff and her party from hearing the approaching train when they were within 100 feet from the track? (4) Was the whistle blown at all after leaving Hartford, and before the place of the accident? The court submitted the first three questions. To the first the jury answered, "Yes;" and to the second and third answered, "No." The fourth question the court refused to submit to the jury, but directed them to answer "Yes," which they did. It is contended upon the part of defendant that the direction of the court to answer "Yes" was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant, for the reason that it had a right to know whether the jury were finding the facts in accordance with the evidence, or whether the jury entirely overlooked and ignored the evidence upon a given point when it was all one way; and whether the jury were applying the law as given by the court to the facts as they found them. The court was not in error in directing the answer to this question, for, as is well said by the court in directing the answer, "the testimony was all one way." It was shown by witnesses both for plaintiff and defendant, and not disputed, that the whistle was blown after the train left Hartford and before it reached the crossing, and there was no testimony tending in any degree to contradict this. Whether it was blown soon after the train left Hartford, at St. John's crossing, or at some other point on the road, is in dispute; but the question was not directed to the point as to where it was blown, but whether it was blown at all after the train left the village. These special questions to the jury are intended for the purpose of a finding upon some particular questions of fact in dispute on the trial. Fowler v. Hoffman, 81 Mich. 215; Pigott v. Engle, 60 Mich. 221. There could have been but one answer to the question, and that was the affirmative one, which the court properly directed.

Defendant further requested the court to charge as follows: "It appears by the testimony on the part of the plaintiff that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was engaged in an unlawful occupation, in that she was driving from the railroad station on Sunday, for pleasure, and not in any work of charity or necessity, and for this reason the defendant is not liable to the plaintiff for injuries resulting from the negligence of its employes." This question was not presented by the oral argument, but we pass upon it because it is insisted upon in the brief of counsel. How. Stat., § 2015, provides: "No person shall keep open his shop, warehouse, or workhouse, or shall do any manner of labor, business, or work, or be present at any dancing, or at any public diversion, show, or entertainment, or take part in any sport, game, or play, on the first day of the week. The foregoing provision shall not apply to works of necessity and charity, nor to the making of mutual promises of marriage, nor the solemnization of marriages. And every person so offending shall be punished by fine not exceeding ten dollars for each offense." It cannot be said that under the testimony in this case the plaintiff was engaged in any unlawful enterprise, even within the terms of this statute, in riding from the railway station to her home in a peaceable and quiet manner on a Sabbath evening. If she had been engaged in an unlawful enterprise within the meaning of the statute, she would be subject to the penalty fixed by the statute. In nearly all the states it has been held under quite similar statutes that a party traveling upon the highway upon a Sabbath, either from necessity or pleasure or business, who is injured by a collision with a railway train at a crossing, is not barred from recovery against the railroad company for its negligence from the fact that the injury occurred on Sunday. Knowlton v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 59 Wis. 278; Jacobus v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. 20 Minn. 130 (Gil. 110), 18 Am. Rep. 860; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Frawley, 110 Ind. 18; Smith v. New York S. & W. R. Co. 46 N. J. L. 7; Carroll v. Staten Island R. Co. 58 N. Y. 124, 17 Am. Rep. 221. It was said in Sharp v. Evergreen Twp., 67 Mich. 443: "A person has the right to travel on a public highway on Sunday for any lawful purpose, and the township charged with the duty of keeping such highway in repair is liable for injuries received under such circumstances, the same as if received on a week day." The request was properly refused.

Judgment is affirmed with costs.

McGrath, J., concurred with Montgomery, J.

Hooker, Ch. J., concurring:

To permit the recovery of a judgment for negligence against a railroad in a case where the injured party drives upon a straight track in daylight the circumstances should be exceptional. And, while darkness may reasonably make the use of the senses—other than sight—the more imperative when approaching a track, the necessity and uniform use of headlights may well lead travelers to expect and rely upon them. In the present case we must assume that the engine and caboose made comparatively little noise, which, if heard, might naturally lead to the inference that it was distant, or upon another railroad, which the absence of a headlight would be likely to confirm. The reflection from the headlight upon the end of the caboose, if where it could be seen, might be equivalent to a headlight, but from the relative directions of the railroad and highway we cannot say that it should have been seen, that being a proper question for the jury. The inference should not be drawn that absence of light excuses negligence, but under the facts in this case we cannot say as matter of law that the plaintiff did not exercise the care and caution which the ordinarily prudent traveler upon a country highway would have exercised. In my opinion, the circuit judge was right in submitting this question to the jury.

Long, J., dissenting:

I am unable to distinguish this case upon principle from Myning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 64 Mich. 93, and from Brady v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 81 Mich. 616, and am of the opinion that under the circumstances shown the plaintiff and her party should have stopped and listened before entering upon the track. In actions for negligent injuries the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that the defendant is entirely responsible for the injuries, and that negligence on the part of plaintiff does not contribute thereto; and negligence on the part of the driver of a team is imputable to the plaintiff under well-settled rules in this state. The evidence in this case shows beyond dispute that the train with which plaintiff collided was making great noise, and the plaintiff and her party could undoubtedly have heard its approach if they had stopped. The fact that it was so dark a night that one could scarcely see the length of the team necessitated that the plaintiff should exercise more than ordinary care; and, as said in Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., supra, if it was difficult to distinguish an approaching train, then ordinary care required a resort to her sense of hearing, and to pause and listen before entering upon this place of danger. This it is not pretended she did do, and I think the court should have instructed the jury that the plaintiff, under such circumstances, could not recover.

Grant, J., dissenting:

I think the court should have directed a verdict in this case for the defendant, on the ground of the plaintiff's own negligence. She, and those who were with her at the time of the accident, testify that the night was very dark; so dark that they had difficulty in finding their team, which had been hitched to the fence by the roadside, to await the arrival of the excursion train upon which two of the party were to come. The situation of the railroad and of the highway appears in the following diagram:

The distance from the depot to the crossing along the railroad is a little over a mile; from St. John's crossing, where it is conceded that the whistle was blown, to the crossing is one-half mile; from Anderson's to the crossing, in a direct line, is over half a mile; from the depot to the first bridge is about three quarters of a mile. Plaintiff and all the members of her party, including the driver, were entirely familiar with the situation. They knew that they were nearing this crossing, which, under all the authorities, is a warning of danger. Trains are liable to approach at any time, and at a high rate of speed. The care to be exercised must be measured by the danger which is imminent. The greater the danger, the greater must be the care. The question is what care, under the circumstances, the plaintiff and those with her owed to themselves and to the defendant in approaching the crossing. The claim of the plaintiff is that she and her party were not obliged to stop their team and listen, but that they had performed their whole duty when they looked back, as they were riding along, to see if they could see signs of an approaching train, and had listened, as well as they could, amid the noise made by their carriage and their two horses. If this constitutes in law proper care and prudence on their part, then the verdict should be sustained; otherwise it should not. The road was gravel, mixed with clay. William Cavanaugh testified that the wagon was making a little rattling on the stones, and again that the wheels made a little noise running over the pebbles. Another of plaintiff's witnesses, Mr. Hilliard, said that it was what was called a "gravel road," covered with a gravelly cement; that it packed, and was as hard almost as stone. One of the party, Miss McShannock, testified that the wagon was making no more noise than an ordinary wagon would make. It is apparent that two horses, and a carriage containing four passengers, going over such a road, would make considerable noise, even upon a walk. It is moreover apparent that the only listening done was done while they were engaged in ordinary conversation. One of the party—John McShannock—testified: "Question. What did you do in the way of listening to hear if there was anything coming? Answer. Well, we all listened. Wasn't making any great amount of noise talking." Miss McShannock testified that they chatted and visited until they got within a little way of the track. Mr. McShannock testified that they were engaged in ordinary conversation, and were sometimes laughing. The only evidence that plaintiff looked or listened comes from one of the party, who says: "I know she looked around,—moved around in her seat. She was looking that way. I don't know whether she did or not. I supposed she did from her movement." She herself testifies that she remembers nothing that occurred. There is no evidence in the record that they all at one time ceased talking and listened. It requires but little noise in close proximity to one to prevent hearing another and greater noise at a distance, which would otherwise be distinctly heard. The night was still. There was no intervening object to obstruct the hearing. All the witnesses agree to this. In daylight the train would have been in plain sight of the plaintiff all the way from the village. The little mound or rise of ground was not above the line of vision, and could therefore have formed no obstruction to hearing. If plaintiff could not see, it became her clear duty to stop and listen. In Brady v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., 81 Mich. 616, the plaintiff was held guilty of negligence in attempting, without stopping and listening, to cross a railroad track so obstructed by intervening objects that he could not see a train approaching from one direction until he was within from 20 to 25 feet of the crossing. In that case plaintiff was alone, and, sitting upon his wagon, was approaching the crossing at a walk, and was looking for a train, which he knew was about due. He testified that he did not hear because the wind was blowing the sound from him. He was held guilty of contributory negligence. It was there said: "A person familiar with a railroad crossing, having been frequently over it, and knowing its location, when approaching the same is under the highest possible obligation to observe such precautions as are needful to avoid a collision; and failure so to do is contributory negligence that will prevent recovery for damages, if any accrue," citing Haas v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 47 Mich. 401. The highest possible obligation certainly requires the exercise of every reasonable precaution to avoid the danger. It certainly makes no difference in what manner one's view of a railroad near a crossing is obstructed, whether by trees, or embankments, or by intense darkness. The duty in the one case is no other or different than in the other. If Brady, whose view was obstructed by trees, could not recover, on account of his own negligence in not stopping and listening, neither should plaintiff in this case, whose view was obstructed by intense darkness. If there is any difference in principle between the two cases, I am unable to discover it.

It is proven beyond controversy that, had the plaintiff and her party stopped their team and listened at any point within 10 rods of this crossing, they would have heard the approaching train, and the distressing accident would not have occurred. Under the evidence, when they were 5 rods from the crossing, the train was from 15 to 20 rods therefrom, and, of course, the distance between them and the train was about 5 rods less. Besides, it is a matter of common experience and knowledge that one can, upon a still night, with nothing to obstruct the hearing, or distract the attention, hear an approaching train in time to avoid collision at a crossing. To hold otherwise would be "to fly in the face" of a fact known to all, and to discredit our own senses. What plaintiff's witnesses heard, under circumstances as favorable or more unfavorable, certainly plaintiff must be held able to have heard if she had listened. One Fred F. Allen was driving over this same road on his way home from the depot at the same time, and heard the train when it was 20 or 25 rods distant. He also testified that he had heard the train on still nights, going over this piece of road, when he was a mile away. This witness had his wife and child with him. One Orange Hutchins was living at the Anderson Place, marked upon the diagram. He was 20 rods from the train, and after the accident heard the voices at the crossing half a mile distant. John Bracken-gast came to Hartford on the same train, and walked home on this same road. When at Anderson's he heard the train, and heard the whistle on the St. John's crossing. Joseph De Vries lived close by this crossing, and was therefore in the same direction from the approaching train as was the plaintiff. He heard the train come over the bridges. R. W. Stickney also came to Hartford on this train, went into the depot and remained a while, and when he came out he heard the train going across the bridge, three quarters of a mile distant. He was more than twice as far from the first bridge as was the plaintiff when nearing the crossing, and more than three times as far from the second bridge. Henry Thomas was approaching another crossing when this same train came along, and testified that he was driving within 10 or 15 rods of the crossing, when his attention was attracted by the rumbling noise of the train. The above were all witnesses for the plaintiff. For the defense one August Ament, who lived 70 rods north of this crossing, testified that on a still night he could hear trains crossing these bridges. The driver, Cavanaugh, testified that when about four rods from the crossing he started his horses from a walk into a trot, but he thinks that they came to a walk when within about two rods of the crossing, and the first knowledge he had of an approaching train was when the horses stepped upon the plank of the crossing, when he "noticed the locomotive loom up."

I think this case is ruled by Brady v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co., supra. It is true that in that case Brady knew that a train was about due, but that can make no difference with the rule. Railroads have the right to run trains out of schedule time, and are constantly doing it. It is the duty of every passenger upon a public highway to approach these crossings with the same care and caution as he would if he had the knowledge that a train is due. When one drives, on a dark night, upon them, without stopping to listen, he is, in my judgment, guilty of gross negligence. He not only disregards his duty towards himself, but his legal duty to those who are traveling upon railroads, for he endangers not only his own life, but the lives of others. See Groetick v. Detroit L. & N. R. Co. 90 Mich. 594; Apsay v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 88 Mich. 482.

Railroad companies and travelers upon the highway are alike bound to the exercise of great care in approaching these dangerous places. The former are liable if they neglect the statutory signals. But this does not justify the latter in assuming that they will hear these signals without stopping to listen when they cannot see. If these signals were given, and the traveler should drive his team upon the crossing without stopping and listening, he would certainly be guilty of negligence, and liable in damages for all the injury which resulted. Neglect of duty by either does not excuse the negligence of the other. When both neglect this plain duty, both are equally guilty, and neither can recover, because each, by the exercise of proper care, could have avoided the accident. The rule as to care must apply to the citizen in his individual as well as in his corporate capacity. The rule requiring the traveler to stop and listen when he cannot see is reasonable. It imposes no hardship or inconvenience. A stop of a few seconds would, in this instance, have warned them of the approaching train. Upon what principle of reason or justice can plaintiff and her companions be held excusable for not doing so? They do not say, nor is it claimed, that they could not have heard the noise of the train if they had stopped. They only say that they believe that they could have heard the whistle and bell without stopping the noise which they themselves were making, and which was under their own control.

The plaintiff and her companions ask the jury to believe their opinions that, notwithstanding that the noise made by their horses and carriage and their conversation was sufficient to drown the noise of the train until it struck them, yet it was not sufficient to drown the noise of the whistle and bell, and that they would have heard them had they sounded. And this, too, in the face of her other witnesses that they heard the train at a much greater distance from the track than was she, and that they also saw the lights upon it. If one must use all his senses, it is his clear duty to put himself in condition to use them, otherwise he has not complied with the law, which requires him not only to listen, but to listen attentively. The duty to stop and listen is supported by the following authorities: Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Stommel, 126 Ind. 85; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Beale, 78 Pa. 504, 13 Am. Rep. 753; Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 64 Mich. 98; Chase v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 78 Me. 353; Flemming v. Western Pac. R. Co. 49 Cal. 258; Henze v. St. Louis, K. O. & N. R. Co. 71 Mo. 636; Pence v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 746; Merkle v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 473. Beach on Contributory Negligence, says, (section 181 :) "In attempting to cross the traveler must listen for signals, notice signs put up as warnings, and look attentively up and down the track. A multitude of decisions of all the courts enforce this reasonable rule. It is also so consonant with right reason and the dictates of ordinary prudence, and so much in line with the ordinary care which the average of mankind display in the daily routine of life, that it should seem to be scarcely dependent upon the authority of decided cases in law courts. The traveler on the highway must even come to a halt for this purpose; but he is not required to get out of his wagon, and go forward on foot for the purpose of looking, especially when such a course would not have prevented the collision, but would rather have exposed the traveler to the very peril it was designed to avoid." In Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., supra, it is said: "Ordinary care would have required him [the traveler] to at least look up and down the track before crossing; and, if the night was so dark as to make it difficult to distinguish a train approaching, then ordinary care would have called upon him to resort to his sense of hearing, and to pause, if need be, and listen, before entering upon the place of danger." In Union Pac. R. Co. v. Adams, 33 Kan. 427, plaintiff, in company with others, was riding along the public highway, and drove upon the track without stopping. In that case, as in this, plaintiff's testimony was that she and her companions did not see the train. It was there said: "It is the duty of the traveler upon a highway about to cross a railroad track to make vigilant use of his senses in order to ascertain whether there is present danger in crossing. . . . It is true that the wind was blowing in nearly an opposite direction from that from which the train was coming, but several of the plaintiff's witnesses heard the train, and we have no doubt that if the plaintiff or Adams had given heed and listened they would have discovered its approach, and could thus have avoided the accident." In that case it was proven that the whistle was not sounded 80 rods from the crossing, as required, and the negligence of the defendant was regarded as proven. See also Grippen v. New York Cent. R. Co. 40 N. Y. 50. It is said in Chase v. Maine Cent. R. Co.: "The verdict is clearly wrong. The rule is now firmly established in this state, as well as in courts generally, that it is negligence per se for a person to cross a track without first looking and listening for a coming train. If his view is unobstructed, he may have no occasion to listen, but, if his view is obstructed, then it is his duty to listen, and to listen carefully. And if one is injured at a crossing by a passing train or engine, which might have been seen if he had looked, or heard if he had listened, presumptively he is guilty of contributory negligence; and, if the presumption is not repelled, a recovery for the injury cannot be had. This [the obstruction] would make it his duty to listen, and to listen carefully and attentively. To do this, if riding in a sleigh, and especially with bells attached, it would become necessary to stop his horse, for surely he could not listen carefully and attentively without stopping his horse, and thus stilling the noise of his own team." This was what was called a "wrecking train." It had been sent out to repair a fallen bridge near by. After repairing the bridge they returned to Hartford, late in the day, to await orders. It arrived at Hartford at about 7 o'clock, where it waited for an excursion train to pass. The engine and tender were built solid, and the tender was about 10 or 12 feet shorter than the ordinary kind of tenders. The cab projected out over the tender. Defendant's witnesses testified that a red light was hanging from a hook in the center of the back end of the roof of the cab. This is the customary place for hanging a lantern in running backward. There were two white lights on the front of the engine, near the pilot, one light on each side of the caboose towards the rear end on the corner, and one on the rear and near the top. The engine was in front of the train running backward. Its headlight was burning, and reflected against the end of the car behind it. It was necessary to run the train in this manner, because there was no turntable between the fallen bridge and the place of the accident. It was not, therefore, negligence per se to run this engine backward. This oftentimes becomes necessary. In Mahlen v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 49 Mich. 585, a passenger train was running without a headlight, and this was excluded by the court from the consideration of the jury. Several of the witnesses for the plaintiff saw the lights upon the train and in the caboose where there were several men. Judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

NOTE.—The nature of the estate created by a deed to both husband and wife is the subject of a note to Baker v. Stewart (Kan.) 2 L. R. A. 424, and is discussed and decided also in *Mittel v. join an execution sale of certain real estate.
Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thompson, Marsh & Thompson for appellants.

Messrs. Watson & Watson and J. L. Engle for appellees.

Dailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action instituted in the court below, in two paragraphs, in the first of which appellees allege, in substance, that on and before December 15, 1884, one Lemuel Wiggins was the owner of a certain tract of real estate, therein described, containing 80 acres; that on said day said Lemuel and his wife, Mary, executed and delivered to the appellees a warranty deed, conveying to them the fee simple of said real estate; that at the time of said conveyance the appellees were, ever since have been, and now are, husband and wife; that said deed conveyed to the appellees the title to said real estate, which they took and accepted, ever since have held, and now hold by entireties, and not otherwise; that appellees hold their title to said real estate by said deed of Lemuel Wiggins, and not otherwise; that on the 24th day of April, 1877, Isaac R. Howard and Isaac N. Gaston, who were defendants below, recovered a judgment in the Randolph circuit court for the sum of $408.70, and costs against one John T. Burroughs and the appellee Daniel S. Wiggins as partners doing business under the firm name of Burroughs & Wiggins; that on May 12, 1886, said Howard and Gaston caused an execution to be issued on said judgment, and placed in the hands of the appellant Thornburg, as sheriff of said county, and directed him to levy the same on said real estate, and that said sheriff did, on the 25th day of May, 1886, levy said execution on said real estate, or on the one-half interest in value thereof taken as the property of said appellee Daniel S. Wiggins, to satisfy said writ; that pursuant to the levy thereof said sheriff proceeded, by the direction of said Howard and Gaston, to advertise said real estate for sale under said execution and levy to make said debt, and did on the 8th day of June advertise the same for sale on the 8d day of July, 1886, and will on said day sell the same unless restrained and enjoined from so doing by the court; that said Daniel S. Wiggins has no interest in said premises subject to sale thereon; that the appellees hold the title thereto as tenants by entireties, and not otherwise; that the sale of said tract on said execution would cast a cloud on the appellees' title, etc. The second paragraph is the same as the first in substantial averments, except that in this paragraph the appellees set out as a part thereof a copy of the deed under which they claim title to said real estate as such tenants by entireties. The granting clause of the deed is as follows: "This indenture witnesseth that Lemuel Wiggins and Mary Wiggins, his wife, of Randolph county, in the state of Indiana, convey and warrant to Daniel S. Wiggins and Laura Belle Wiggins, his wife, in joint tenancy," etc. Appellants separately and severally demurred to each paragraph of the complaint, and their demurrers were overruled by the court, to which the appellants excepted, and, refusing to answer the complaint, judgment was rendered in favor of appellees on said demurrers. Appellants appeal, assigning as errors the overruling of said demurrers, and urge that the appellees under the deed took as joint tenants, and hence that the husband's interest is subject to levy and sale upon execution.

A joint tenancy is an estate held by two or more persons jointly, so that during the lives of all they are equally entitled to the enjoyment of the land, or its equivalent, in rents and profits; but upon the death of one his share vests in the survivor or survivors until there be but one survivor, when the estate becomes one in severalty in him, and descends to his heirs upon his death. It must always arise by purchase, and cannot be created by descent. Such estates may be created in fee, for life, or years, or even in remainder. But the estate held by each tenant must be alike. Joint tenancy may be destroyed by anything which destroys the unity of title. Our law aims to prevent their creation, and they cannot arise except by the instrument providing for such tenancy. Griffin v. Lynch, 16 Ind. 398, 9 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 850, says: "Husband and wife are, at common law, one person, so that when realty or personalty vests in them both equally, they take as one person: they take but one estate as a corporation would take. In the case of realty, they are seised, not per my et per tout, as joint tenants are, but simply per tout; both are seised of the whole, and each being thus seised of the entirety, they are called tenants by the entirety, and the estate is an estate by entireties. Estates by entireties may be created by will, by instrument of gift or purchase, and even by inheritance. Each tenant is seised of the whole, the estate is inseverable—cannot be partitioned; neither husband nor wife can alone affect the inheritance, the survivor's right to the whole." This tenancy has been spoken of as "that peculiar estate which arises upon the conveyance of lands to two persons who are at the time husband and wife, commonly called 'estates by entirety.'" As to the general features of estates by entireties there is little room for controversy, and there is none between counsel. Our statute re-enacts the common law. Arnold v. Arnold, 30 Ind. 305; Davis v. Clark, 26 Ind. 424, 89 Am. Dec. 471. Strictly speaking, estates by entireties are not joint tenancies (Chandler v. Cheney, 87 Ind. 391; Hulett v. Inton, 57 Ind. 412, 26 Am. Rep. 64); the husband and wife being seised, not of moieties, but both seised of the entirety per tout, and not per my. Jones v. Chandler, 40 Ind. 589; Davis v. Clark, and Arnold v. Arnold, supra. It has been said by this court in some of the earlier decisions that no particular words are necessary. A conveyance which would make two persons joint tenants will make a husband and wife tenants of the entirety. It is not even necessary that they be described as such, or their marital relation referred to. Morrison v. Seybold, 92 Ind. 302; Hadlock v. Gray, 104 Ind. 596; Dodge v. Kinzy, 101 Ind. 102; Hulett v. Inlow, 57 Ind. 414, 26 Am. Rep. 64; Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 395. But the court has said that the general rule may be defeated by the expression of conditions, limitations, and stipulations in the conveyance which clearly indicate the creation of a different estate. Hadlock v. Gray, supra; Edwards v. Beall, 75 Ind. 401. Having its origin in the fiction or common-law unity of husband and wife, the courts of some states have held that married women's acts extending their rights destroyed estates by entirety, but this court holds otherwise (Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 223, 46 Am. Rep. 210); and the greater weight of authority is in its favor. Our decisions hold that neither alone can alienate such estate. Jones v. Chandler, and Morrison v. Seybold, supra. There can be no partition. Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391. A mortgage executed by the husband alone is void (Jones v. Chandler, 40 Ind. 591); and the same is true of a mortgage executed by both to secure a debt of the husband (Dodge v. Kinzy, 101 Ind. 105); and the wife cannot validate it by agreement with the purchaser to indemnify in case of loss arising on account of it. State v. Kennett, 114 Ind. 160. A judgment against one of them is no lien upon it. Barren Creek Ditching Co. v. Beck, 99 Ind. 250; McConnell v. Martin, 52 Ind. 484; Orthwein v. Thomas (Ill.) 13 N. E. Rep. 564 [See also 127 Ill. 554, 4 L. R. A. 484]. Upon the death of one, the survivor takes the whole in fee. Arnold v. Arnold, supra. The deceased leaves no estate to pay debts (Simpson v. Pearson, 31 Ind. 1, 99 Am. Dec. 577); and during their joint lives there can be no sale of any part on execution against either. Carver v. Smith, supra; Dodge v. Kinzy, 101 Ind. 105; Hulett v. Inlow, 57 Ind. 412, 26 Am. Rep. 64; Chandler v. Cheney, Davis v. Clark and McConnell v. Martin, supra; Cox v. Wood, 20 Ind. 64. The statutes extending the rights of married women have no effect whatever upon estates by entirety. Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 223, 46 Am. Rep. 210. Such estate is in no sense either the husband's or the wife's separate property. The husband may make a valid conveyance of his interest to his wife, because it is with her consent. Enyeart v. Kepler, 118 Ind. 84.

The rule that husband and wife take by entireties was enacted in this territory in 1807, nine years before Indiana was vested with statehood, and has been repeated in each succeeding revision of our statutes. It has thus been the law of real property with us for eighty-six years. Section 2922, Rev. Stat. 1881, provides that "all conveyances and devises of lands, or of any interest therein, made to two or more persons, except as provided in the next following section, shall be construed to create estates in common, and not in joint tenancy, unless it be expressed therein that the grantees or devisees shall hold the same in joint tenancy and to the survivor of them, or it shall manifestly appear from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy." Section 2923 provides that the preceding section shall not apply to conveyances made to husband and wife. Under a statute of the state of Michigan, similar in all its essential qualities to our own, the court held that, "where lands are conveyed in fee to husband and wife, they do not take as tenants in common" (Fisher v. Provin, 25 Mich. 347); they take by entireties. Whatever would defeat the title of one, would defeat the title of the other. Manwaring v. Powell, 40 Mich. 871. They hold neither as tenants in common nor as ordinary joint tenants. The survivor takes the whole. During the lives of both, neither has an absolute inheritable interest; neither can be said to own an undivided half. Aetna Ins. Co. v. Resh, Id. 241; Allen v. Allen, 47 Mich. 74.

While the rule of entireties was predicated upon a fiction, the legislative intent in this state has always been to preserve this estate, and has continued the peculiar statute for this purpose. Estates by entireties have been preserved as between husband and wife, although joint tenancies between unmarried persons have been abolished, so as to provide a mode by which a safe and suitable provision could be made for married women. Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 227, 46 Am. Rep. 210. "Where a rule of property has existed for seventy years and is sustained by a strong and uniform line of judicial decisions, there is but little room for the court to exercise its judgment on the reasons on which the rule is founded. . . . Such a rule of property will be overruled only for the most cogent reasons and upon the strongest convictions of its incorrectness. . . . It is evident that the Legislature of 1881 did not intend to repeal the statutes establishing tenancies by entireties. They simply intended to enlarge in some particulars the separate power of the wife, which already existed under the Acts of 1852 and the years following. . . . It did not abolish estates by entireties as between husband and wife, but provided that when a joint deed was made to husband and wife, they should hold by entireties, and not as tenants in common or as joint tenants." Carver v. Smith, supra. In Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 396, the court says: "It was a well-settled rule at common law that the same form of words which, if the grantees were unmarried, would have constituted them joint tenants, will, they being husband and wife, make them tenants by entirety. The rule has been changed by our statute above quoted." The whole trend of authorities, however, is in the direction of preserving such tenancies, where the grantees sustain the relation of husband and wife, unless from the language employed in the deed it is manifest that a different purpose was intended. Where a contrary intention is clearly expressed in the deed, a different rule obtains. "A husband and wife may take real estate as joint tenants or tenants in common, if the instrument creating the title use apt words for the purpose." 1 Preston, Estates, 182; 3 Bl. Com., Sharswood's note; 4 Kent, Com. *368; 1 Bishop, Married Women, §§ 616 et seq.; Freem. Coten. § 72; Fladung v. Rose, 58 Md. 13-24. "And in case of de-wise and conveyances to husband and wife together, though it has been said that they can take only as tenants by entireties, the prevailing rule is that, if the instrument expressly so provides, they may take as joint tenants or tenants in common." Stewart, Husb. & W. §§ 807-810; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 244. "And as by common law it was competent to make husband and wife tenants in common by proper words in the deed or devise," etc. (Hoffman v. Stigers, 28 Iowa, 810; Brown v. Brown, 188 Ind. 476), "so it seems that husband and wife may by express words be made tenants in common by gift to them during coverture." McDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 80. In Hadlock v. Gray, 104 Ind. 599, a conveyance had been made to Isaac Cannon and Mary Cannon, who were husband and wife, during their natural lives, and the court says: "The language employed in the deed under examination plainly declares that Isaac and Mary Cannon are not to take as tenants by entirety. The result would follow from the provision destroying the survivorship, for this is the grand and essential characteristic of such a tenancy. . . . The whole force of the language employed is opposed to the theory that the deed creates an estate in fee in the husband and wife." The court further says: "It is true that where real property is conveyed to husband and wife jointly, and there are no limiting words in the deed, they will take the estate as tenants in entirety. . . . But, while the general rule is as we have stated it, there may be conditions, limitations, and stipulations in the deed conveying the property which will defeat the operation of the rule. The denial of this proposition involves the affirmation of the proposition that a grantor is powerless to limit or define the estate which he grants, and this would conflict with the fundamental principle that a grantor may for himself determine what estate he will grant. To deny this right would be to deny to parties the right to make their own contracts. It seems quite clear, upon principle, that a grantor and his grantees may limit and define the estate granted by the one and accepted by the others, although the grantees be husband and wife." The court then adopts the language of Washburn (1 Washb. Real Prop. 674) and Tiedeman, supra. In Edwards v. Beall, supra, the court holds that when lands are granted husband and wife as tenants in common they will hold by moieties, as other distinct and individual persons would do. If, as contended by appellees, the rule prevail that the same words which, if the grantees were unmarried, would have constituted them joint tenants, will, they being husband and wife, make them tenants by entireties, then it would result as a logical conclusion that husband and wife cannot be joint tenants, because by this rule, words, however apt or appropriate to create a joint tenancy, would, in a conveyance to husband and wife, result in an estate by entireties; joint tenancy would be superseded or put in abeyance by the estate created by law,—tenancy by entirety. The result of such reasoning would be to destroy the contractual power of the parties where this relationship between the grantees is shown to exist. Any other process of reasoning would carry the rule too far, and we must hold it modified to the extent here indicated. Husband and wife, notwithstanding tenancies by entirety exist as they did under the common law, may take and hold lands for life, in joint tenancy or in common, if appropriate language be expressed in the deed or will creating it; and we know of no more apt term to create a joint tenancy in the grantees in this estate than the expression "convey and warrant to Daniel S. Wiggins and Laura Belle Wiggins in joint tenancy." These words appear in the granting clause of the deed conveying the land in question, and the estate accepted and held by the grantees is thereby limited, and they hold, not by entireties, but in joint tenancy. A joint tenant's interest in property is subject to execution. Freem. Executions, 125.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the circuit court to sustain the demurrer to the paragraph of the complaint.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin defendants from filling up certain sluiceways. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. G. Newton for appellants.

Messrs. H. Stoddard and S. A. York, Jr., for appellees.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

All the questions of law made in this case depend upon a question of fact. In their complaint the plaintiffs say they are the owners of a piece of land adjoining a sluiceway running out of and into Quinnipiac river. In the second count the sluiceway is spoken of as "a river or watercourse." If the sluiceway so spoken of is a "river" or "a watercourse," so that the owners adjoining it on either side have riparian rights of the same kind and to the same extent that landowners upon the banks of an inland stream possess them, then the contention of the plaintiffs is correct, and there is error in the judgment of the superior court; otherwise there is no error. From the finding it appears that the Quinnipiac river flows southerly, and empties into New Haven harbor. The lower part of the river is a part of that harbor. That part of the city of New Haven which lies on the easterly side of the river at this point is called "Fair Haven." On the Fair Haven side the flats spread out originally very wide between the upland and the channel of the river. The highway which has always existed from Fair Haven to New Haven is now known as "Grand Avenue." About one hundred years ago a bridge was built across the Quinnipiac river as a part of this highway. In building it a causeway was constructed from the upland on the Fair Haven side over the flats to a point where a pier was placed. About 20 feet westerly from that pier another pier was erected. Over the space between these two piers a bridge was laid. From the second pier the causeway was continued westerly about 100 feet further, and constructed solid by filling in earth, where a third pier was built. From the third pier the bridge was carried across upon a series of piers to the westerly side of the river. The space so left between the first and second piers afforded a passageway, through which the water passed and repassed with the tides. At low tide there was no water at that place. At high tide the water was about six feet deep. The plaintiffs' predecessors in title were the owners of the upland on the north side of the highway. The predecessors in title of the defendants owned the upland on the south side of the highway. These, and other owners north and south of the highway, have from time to time reclaimed the flats lying in front of their respective pieces of upland. In doing so they have conformed to the plan of the causeway and bridge; that is to say, they have each left an open space in the filling, for the water to pass through, at the same place and of the same width as the one left in the causeway. The sluiceway so formed extends north of the highway about 200 feet, and south of the highway about 125 feet, is open at both ends to the water of the harbor when the tide runs, and is the "river" or "watercourse" described in the complaint, for the obstruction of which the plaintiffs seek to recover damages. The reclaimed land of the plaintiffs, as well as that of the defendants, with the opening through it, as is above stated, had been in substantially the same condition that it was in for more than fifteen years before this suit was brought.

The plaintiffs asked the court to hold that the sluiceway had become a watercourse, in which they, as riparian proprietors, had all the usual rights of riparian proprietors. The court did not so decide. The only reason of appeal which it is necessary to consider is that "the court erred in holding that the premises in question had not become upland and said sluiceway a watercourse, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the ordinary rights of a riparian owner in such watercourse." All the waters on the face of the earth may be divided into tide waters and inland waters. It is only to the latter that the term "watercourse" can be applied. Watercourses are commonly denominated rivers, rivulets, or brooks, according to their magnitude. It is only upon watercourses that riparian rights exist. Chancellor Walworth, in Child v. Starr, 4 Hill, 375, said that "a watercourse had ripam, but not littus." So, conversely, it may be said that the tide water has littora, but not ripas. Littoral are very different from riparian rights. A watercourse consists of bed, banks, and water. Yet the water need not flow continually; there are many watercourses which are sometimes dry. To maintain the right to a watercourse it must be made to appear that the water usually flows in a certain direction, and by a regular channel, with banks and sides. Angell, Watercourses, § 4; Gould, Waters, § 41. "It may be natural, as where it is made by the natural flow of the water caused by the general superficies of the surrounding land from which the water is collected into one channel; or it may be artificial, as in case of a ditch or other artificial means used to divert water from its natural channel, or to carry it from lowlands, from which it will not flow in consequence of the natural formation of the surface of the surrounding land." Earl v. De Hart, 12 N. J. Eq. 283, 284, 72 Am. Dec. 895. A watercourse implies a source, a current, and a place of discharge. "A river or stream begins at its source, where it comes to the surface." Angell, Watercourses, § 46. "A watercourse is a stream of water usually flowing in a definite channel, having a bed and sides or banks, and usually discharging itself into some other stream or body of water." Luther v. Winnisimmet Co. 9 Cush. 174; Gillett v. Johnson, 80 Conn. 180. "A river is a considerable stream of water, that has a current of its own, 'flowing from a higher level, which constitutes its source, to its mouth, where it debouches.' The Garden City, 26 Fed. Rep. 766. "It is the moving of the water from the source to the mouth that makes the watercourse." Challenor v. Thomas, Yelv. 143. "Pons aqua, aqua currens, et ostium, est aqua cursus." The word 'river' is derived from the Latin 'rivus.' 'Rivus est locus per longitudinem depressus quo aqua decurrit.' Ulpian's Dig. "De Rivis." And it is used constantly by the Latin authors in a sense that implies a current from a source to a mouth. "Rivorum a fonte deductio." Cicero. "Omnia flumina aique rivos qui ad mare pertinebant." Caesar. State v. Gilmanston, 9 N. H. 461, 14 N. H. 477. "It is a river or watercourse from the point where the water comes to the surface, and begins to flow in a channel, until it mixes with the sea, arm of the sea, lake, or other water. It may sometimes be dry, but in order to be within the above definition it must appear that the water usually flows in a particular direction, and has a regular channel, with bed, banks, or sides." Dudden v. Clutton Union Guardians, 1 Hurlst. & N. 627; Gould, Waters, 41; Gallup v. Tracy, 25 Conn. 10, 17; Stanchfield v. Newton, 142 Mass. 110, 116, and note. "A large stream of water flowing in a channel on land towards the ocean, a lake, or another river; a stream larger than a rivulet or brook." Webster, Dict. "River." "A large inland stream of water flowing into the sea, a lake, or another river; a stream larger than a brook." Worcester, Dict. "A stream flowing in a channel into another river, into the ocean, or into a lake or sea." Stor. Dict. "A large stream of water flowing through a certain portion of the earth's surface, and discharging itself into the sea, a lake, marsh, or another river." Imp. Dict. "A considerable body of water flowing, with a perceptible current, in a certain definite course or channel, and usually without cessation during the entire year." Century Dict. "A 'watercourse,' as defined in the law, means a living stream, with definite banks and channel, not necessarily running all the time, but fed from more permanent sources than mere surface water." Jeffers v. Jeffers, 107 N. Y. 650; Joliet & O. R. Co. v. Healy, 94 Ill. 416, 421.

We have cited these numerous authorities for the purpose of showing clearly that the sluiceway in question was not and is not a watercourse, as that term is known in the law. If it be granted that the reclaimed land owned by the plaintiffs may be treated as upland, it does not follow that the sluiceway is a river, or any other kind of watercourse. At the most it is like an inlet or ravine in the land, into which the water of the harbor runs when the tide rises, and out of which the water flows when the tide falls. That it is open at both ends, so that the water may run clear through,—in one direction when the tide is rising and in the other direction when the tide falls,—can make no difference. If by a figurative use of speech this sluice can be said to have banks and a bed, it certainly has no water of its own.

The water of the harbor runs into it and runs out again. A man can take as many steps on a treadmill as on a highway, but he cannot perform a journey on it. The treadmill is not a highway. Water may flow into this sluice and flow out again, but it does not therein pursue a course. There is no stream of water passing through it in the sense of a watercourse. There is no current, as the word "current" is applied to a stream of water. It has no source distinguishable from its mouth, and it has no mouth distinguishable from its source. It is not a watercourse.

In their brief and in their oral argument the plaintiffs made their claim in another form,—that the court erred in holding that they, the plaintiffs, had not the right to have the waters ebb and flow in the sluiceway as they had been accustomed to flow. This is only claiming that the ordinary riparian rights which attach to an inland stream of water ought to apply to the water of the sluice. The plaintiffs say that the waters of the harbor have ebbed and flowed through the sluice for more than fifteen years, and that thereby they have obtained the right to have the waters continue to so ebb and flow by adverse use. We are not able to see that anything has been done or omitted by the plaintiffs or by the defendants which was adverse to any right of the other. The plaintiffs have done nothing which they had not a perfect right to do. They have done nothing to which the defendants could have made any legal objections. The plaintiffs and their grantors were the owners of the upland adjacent to the water. They exercised their unquestioned right to reclaim the flats in front of their land by filling them up in such manner as they chose, as far out as the channel of the harbor, or as far as they desired to do. They did not make the filling continuous, but left a space unfilled, into which the tide has ever since caused the water to flow. They owned the land next north of the causeway built as an approach to the Grand avenue bridge. In that causeway there had been left an open space twenty feet wide. The plaintiffs put their unfilled space so that it connected with the open space in the causeway, and they have at all times since made such use of their unfilled space as they desired, at no time doing anything of which the defendants, or any other owner, could make any legal complaint. The defendants and their grantors owned the upland bordering upon the tide water next south of the causeway. They too exercised their right to reclaim the flats in front of their land by filling them up in such manner as they chose, as far out as the channel of the harbor, or as far as they desired to do; but they did not make their filling solid and continuous. They left an unfilled space, so that it connected on the south with the opening in the causeway, and into which the tides have ever since set the waters of the adjacent river. They have made such use of their open space as they desired, at no time doing anything they had not the most perfect right to do, and at no time doing anything of which the plaintiffs, or any other owner, could have made legal complaint. So that nothing has been done at any time by either of these parties which was adverse to any right of the other. Let this be tested in another way. Suppose the defendants had never filled in their flats further than the east side of the sluiceway, and that they now proposed to continue the filling further west, as far as the harbor line, and to make the filling solid, could the plaintiffs cause them to be enjoined? Obviously not, for the defendants would be doing only that which they had the clear right to do. Prior v. Swartz, 62 Conn. 182, 18 L. R. A. 668; Mather v. Chapman, 40 Conn. 382, 16 Am. Rep. 46. If the plaintiffs could not successfully resist an obstruction to the sluice in the way supposed, it is certain that they cannot lawfully complain of what the defendants are now doing.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

The other Judges concurred.

v.

James BENNETT.

(.....Fla.....)

*1. The provision of the Act of May 11, 1893, chapter 4130, that all appeals in chancery, whether from final decrees or interlocutory orders, must be taken within six months after the entry of the decree or order appealed from, has no retroactive effect, but applies only to decrees and orders entered after the act becomes operative. The act took effect August 1, 1893, or sixty days after the final adjournment of the legislature.

2. The purpose of section 18 of article 3 of the Constitution, that a statute shall not take effect until sixty days from the final adjournment of the legislature at which it may be enacted unless otherwise specially provided in the act, was to enable the people to become acquainted with the provisions of legislation, and not to require them to govern their actions by the same before it has become operative.

MOTION for a supersedeas to a decree of the Circuit Court for Duval County, affirming a decree revoking the probate of the last will and testament of Mary Williams, deceased, an attempt to appeal from which had previously been made. Motion granted.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. M. C. Jordan for the motion.

Messrs. Walker & L'Engle contra.

Raney, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 26th day of May, 1892, a decree was rendered in the circuit court of Duval county affirming, on appeal, a decree which had been previously made by the county judge revoking the probate of an alleged last will and testament of Mary Williams, alias Mary Bennett, and from the stated decree of the circuit court the above-named Sammis entered an appeal in October of the present year to the January term, 1894, of this court, and now he moves for a supersedeas to the decree appealed from. Rev. Stat., § 1280, provides that appeals from the circuit court to the supreme court, in matters arising before the county judge and pertaining to his probate jurisdiction, shall be governed in all respects by the law and rules regulating appeals in chancery. Prior to the enactment of chapter 4180, Laws of 1893, approved May 11, 1893, the period of time allowed for taking such appeals to this court was two years (Rev. Stat. § 1456), but the mentioned statute of the present year, "An Act to Limit the Time within Which Appeals in Chancery may be Taken," provides that "all appeals in chancery, whether from final decrees or interlocutory orders, must be taken within six months after the entry of the final decree or of the entry of the interlocutory order or decree appealed from." This act became of force, under section 18 of article 3 of the Constitution, on August 1, or sixty days after the final adjournment of the legislature, its session of 1893 having closed on the second day of June. It was the purpose of the Revised Statutes, § 1280, that the time for taking appeals like the one before us should conform to that prescribed for appeals from chancery decrees of the circuit court.

The purpose of section 18 of article 3 of the Constitution, that a statute shall not take effect until sixty days from the final adjournment of the legislature at which it may have been enacted, unless it is otherwise specially provided in the act, is, according to what we deem the better view, to enable the people to become acquainted with its provisions, but not to require them to govern their actions by the law before it becomes operative. It was contemplated that by the lapse of the sixty days the statutes of the session of the legislature would be published and be accessible to the public, but they are not operative laws until the stated period has expired, and no one can be charged with notice of them reasonably until it does expire, or, what is the same, until they go into effect. Fries v. Hopkin, 13 Mich. 318. This statute, if applicable to the case at bar, took the appellant's right of appeal away from him upon its taking effect, or immediately upon his being charged with notice of its enactment, or, in substance, without notice. In the case of ordinary statutes of limitation this could not be done even before the matter was regulated as it is now by our organic law; on the contrary, there had to be reasonable time allowed for bringing action. Spencer v. McBride, 14 Fla. 408; Cooley, Const. Lim. 451. It is now provided by our constitution that "no statute shall be passed lessening the time within which a civil action may be commenced on any cause of action existing at the time of its passage." Section 39, article 3. But this view we take of the legislation of the present year relieves us from deciding whether or not statutes limiting appeals are within this organic provision. That statute has, in our judgment, no relation to decrees entered prior to its taking effect, but only to those entered subsequently thereto. Statutes will not be given a retrospective effect unless their terms show clearly that such an effect was intended. The appeals referred to are those from decrees that might be entered subsequently to the act's taking effect, and the language does not justify the conclusion that any other than subsequent decrees are meant. Its language is not such as to justify the conclusion that the legislature intended to take away, without notice, from parties situated like the appellant, the right to have adverse decrees reviewed by a court which has been expressly provided by the constitution with jurisdiction for such purpose. It does not show that such hardships and injustice were intended, and it is not reasonable to impute to the law-making power such a purpose, in the absence of words clearly evincing that intent. McCarthy v. Davis, 38 Fla. 508; Capelle v. Barker, 38 Houst. (Del.) 844; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 271, 272, 289; State v. Thompson, 41 Mo. 25; White v. Blum, 4 Neb. 555; *State v. 1. The place of making the contract is presumably that of its performance, in the absence of anything indicating the contrary.

2. The place from which a telegram is sent to another state is the place of the contract made by the message, in the absence of anything therein to the contrary.
3. No cause of action on contract can arise before the contract is broken.
4. Service in another state upon a foreign corporation after an order of publication has been made is insufficient, where there is no attachment, to give jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against the corporation, although it had no property within the state which could be reached by attachment.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from judgments of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Hampton County dismissing actions brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain contracts made with the defendants, which were foreign corporations, upon which the summons had been served in accordance with the statutes providing for substituted service of process. Affirmed.

In dismissing the complaint in the court below, the judge rendered the following opinion:

"In the first of the aforesaid actions, the complaint was dismissed as to the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company, because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. As to the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, the service of summons was set aside, and the complaint in each action dismissed, on motion, because the service of summons was illegal, and gave the court no jurisdiction. The S. C. Forsaith Machine Company is a corporation created under the laws of New Hampshire. It is a foreign corporation, owning no property in South Carolina, and having no agent resident here. The summons in each case was personally served upon an officer of the corporation in the state of New Hampshire. The action in each case is upon a money demand, and a personal judgment is demanded, no writ of attachment having issued, and there being in South Carolina no property to be attached. The plaintiffs claim jurisdiction of our courts over this foreign corporation, because the cause of action arose in the state. I held, on the hearing in open court, that the service of the summons was nugatory, and that the court had no jurisdiction to render a personal judgment in either case, and signed orders of dismissal. I promised to give my reasons for so doing more fully. The simple question is, Can a resident creditor, by open account or written contract to pay money, bring his action in the common pleas in this state

NOTE.—For an extensive note on the validity of personal judgments rendered upon constructive service of process, see Moyer v. Bucks (Ind.) 16 L. R. A. 231.

The above case is very important as dealing with constructive service on a foreign corporation in view of statutory provisions in various states assuming to give jurisdiction over foreign corporations without any service other than constructive. These provisions are broad enough, if they were 22 L. R. A.

constitutional, to authorize a personal judgment against a foreign corporation upon constructive service by publication alone, and it seems somewhat remarkable that their constitutionality has not been heretofore tested in view of their seeming conflict with the general rule laid down in the leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565, although that case did not relate specifically to foreign corporations.

against a foreign corporation having no property here, by serving the summons in the foreign jurisdiction, and recover a personal judgment? I hold that neither section 155 (old 157) of the Code, nor any amendment thereof, gives any such jurisdiction to our courts. The cause of action in each of these cases, if any exists, is the breach of the contract, and this occurred where the provisor resides, to wit, in New Hampshire. This takes it out of our statute; but, even if it did not, I would still refuse to stultify the court by rendering a personal judgment against the defendant in these cases, begun by services of a summons in New Hampshire. The statute of New York is similar to ours, and, if plaintiff's action can be maintained, then almost every corporation created under the law of other states would be amenable to the courts of New York, as I suppose there are few of them that do not owe a debt by bond or otherwise to the citizens of New York. The proposition I deemed untenable. Such is, in brief, my reason for signing the orders of dismissal."

The letter referred to in the opinion of the supreme court is as follows:

"Manchester, N. H., 5-5, '93.

"W. S. Tillinghast, Esq., Hampton C. H., S. C.

"Dear Sir: In accordance with our promise by wire, we write you concerning the subject of your telegram to us on the 27th, reporting that Mr. Mitchell has returned, and given us a statement of affairs at Alameda. We are not clear from him as to your claims, nor is there anything in your message to make same clear: and we ask you to have the kindness to advise us fully what you do claim from this company, and what you claim from the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company, as we are willing to pay anything that is just therein. But as we understood a reference was to be made, as agreed upon by both parties, as to what would be proper in the amount of fees, but this does not appear to materialize, will you have the kindness, therefore, to give us fully a statement of your claims, and they shall have prompt attention upon our part.

Yours respectfully, W. E. Drew, Agent."

Messrs. C. J. C. Hutson, L. F. Youmans and James W. Moore for appellants.

Messrs. E. F. Warren and C. P. Sanders for respondents.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two cases were originally heard and considered together by this court during November term, 1892, and on the 21st of February, 1893, this court filed its opinion affirming the orders appealed from, as may be seen by reference to 17 S. E. Rep. 31. Subsequently, the appellants filed petitions for rehearing, which were granted (17 S. E. Rep. 724, 725), and the cases were reheard during the present term of this court. As we still think there are some differences in the facts of the two cases, notwithstanding the opinion of counsel to the contrary, we are of opinion that it will be better to consider the cases separately.

In the Tillinghast Case, it appears that on the 7th of May, 1892, the plaintiff issued a summons against the two companies named as defendants herein, calling on them to answer the complaint, dated—and, we suppose filed—on the same day. In that complaint the plaintiff alleges that he is an attorney at law, practicing in the courts of this state; that as such he had previously instituted an action in the name of one W. R. Smith against the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company, alleging insolvency of said company, waste of assets, and asking that a receiver be appointed to take charge of said company's property for the protection of the rights of creditors and shareholders of said company; that he applied for and obtained an order for the appointment of a temporary receiver, who took charge of said assets; that, prior to the day agreed upon for the hearing of the motion for the appointment of a permanent receiver, all the parties interested, either as shareholders or creditors of said Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company, met in the city of Boston, and settled their conflicting claims and interests; that as soon as the said adjustment was made, all parties being desirous that the proceedings for the appointment of a receiver should be discontinued, a telegram was sent by the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, one of the defendants in the receiver case, that they would be responsible for the expenses of said case, which expenses included plaintiff's fee in said case, which expenses were to be ascertained by a reference; that on receipt of said telegram an agreement, in writing, was entered into between the plaintiff herein, the said W. R. Smith, plaintiff in the receiver case, and E. F. Warren, Esq., attorney for both of the defendants herein, a copy of which is exhibited as a part of the complaint; that, upon the delivery of said agreement to the plaintiff herein, he took an order discontinuing the receiver case, whereupon the assets of the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company were surrendered by the temporary receiver; that the plaintiff herein, without success, attempted to have the reference contemplated by said agreement, and finally one Hiram Mitchell, who came here as agent, and was the agent of the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, refused to have the reference, and left the county, returning to New Hampshire; that the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company is a foreign corporation, created under the laws of the state of Maine, and doing business and owns real and personal property in Hampton county, S. C.; that the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company is a foreign corporation, created under the laws of the state of New Hampshire, and owning an interest in the stock or property aforesaid of the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company in Hampton county aforesaid; that plaintiff is a resident of South Carolina, and the contract for the payment of his fee, as aforesaid, arose and was made in Hampton county, S. C.; and, after other allegations as to the value of his professional services, the plaintiff demanded judgment for the same.

The following is a copy of the telegram referred to in the complaint: "Boston, Mass., April 9, 1892. To E. F. Warren, Hampton, S. C.: Discontinue all suits against lumber company, and get the matter out of court, and we will be responsible for cost, to be ascertained by reference, as the lumber company will resume business. S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, Manchester, N. H.,"—and the following is a copy of the agreement entered into after receipt of said telegram: "The state of South Carolina, county of Hampton. In common pleas. W. R. Smith Plaintiff, v. The Boston & Port Royal Lumber Co. Whereas, all parties interested in above case have agreed to a settlement thereof; and whereas, the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, of Manchester, N. H., has agreed to pay W. S. Tillinghast, plaintiff's attorney, his fee herein, (it being conceded by all parties hereto that such fee is to be paid, under the law, out of the general assets of the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company,) such fee to be ascertained by a reference; and whereas, it is agreed that the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company will protect W. R. Smith in his interest as the same may appear: In consideration of the foregoing, the above-entitled cause is to be withdrawn. It is further agreed that said reference to ascertain the amounts of said fees and costs will be held within next week, before —, if said fees and costs cannot be adjusted without such reference. [Signed] W. S. Tillinghast, Plaintiff's Attorney. E. F. Warren, Defendant's Attorney. W. R. Smith." On the 5th of July, 1892, upon the usual affidavit of the plaintiff, an order of publication was granted by the clerk of the court of common pleas for Hampton county, S. C., requiring publication to be made in the Manchester Daily Mirror, a newspaper published in the city of Manchester, state of New Hampshire, once a week for six successive weeks, and that a copy of the summons and complaint be forthwith deposited in the post-office in Hampton, addressed to the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, Manchester, N. H. Such communication appears to have been sent by registered letter on the 8th of July, 1892, but it does not appear that any publication was ever made; the plaintiff relying upon service of the defendant company in New Hampshire in lieu thereof, as appears by the affidavit (a copy of which is set out in the "case") of one Daniel T. Healey, sheriff of the county in which the city of Manchester is located, made before one Thomas D. Luce, styling himself "Clerk Supreme Court," of said county, and certified to by him under his "hand and official seal," though no copy of such seal is affixed. It may be as well to state here that the action was dismissed as to the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, there being no appeal from the order entered to that fact, the case should now be considered as an action against the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company alone. Upon the papers above set forth and referred to, a motion was made before his honor, Judge Hudson, to set aside service of summons and complaint on the said defendant, made at their place of business in the city of Manchester, state of New Hampshire, and to dismiss the complaint of plaintiff for want of jurisdiction, whereupon the following order was granted: "On hearing the pleadings in above-stated case, and on motion of Jeff. Warren, attorney for the S. C. Forsaith Company, defendant, to set aside service of summons and complaint on the said defendant made at their place of business in the city of Manchester, state of New Hampshire, and to dismiss the complaint of plaintiff for want of jurisdiction, counsel having been heard, it appearing to the satisfaction of this court that the defendant, S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, are a foreign corporation, and nonresidents of this state; that they have no property within the limits of this state, are represented by no agent, and have no place of business therein; that the cause of action, to wit, the breach of the contract, did not arise within the limits of this state; and that service of summons and complaint was made in the city of Manchester, state of New Hampshire,—ordered, that the complaint of plaintiff be dismissed, this court having no jurisdiction, on the grounds above set forth." Subsequently, the judge filed a paper setting forth more fully his reasons, a copy of which may be found in the former report of this case in 17 S. E. Rep. 31, 38 S. C.—, and which, therefore, need not be set out here. From this order, plaintiff appeals upon the three grounds set out in the record, which make, substantially, three questions: (1) Was there error in holding that the cause of action did not arise in this state? (2) Was there error in holding that the breach of the contract constituted the cause of action? (3) Was there error in holding that, even if the cause of action arose in this state, the courts of this state could not take jurisdiction of an action in personam, and render a personal judgment against a party served with the summons outside of the limits of this state?

To determine the first question, two inquiries present themselves: First, when was the contract made? Second, where was it to be performed? These inquiries involve mixed questions of law and fact; and, so far as the latter are concerned, the finding of the circuit judge is conclusive, in a case of this kind. Hester v. Rasin Fertilizer Co. 33 S. C. 609. But the rule of law is that, "in the absence of anything indicating the contrary, the place of the making of a contract is presumably that of its performance," as was said by Mr. Justice McGowan in Ournow v. Phoenix Ins. Co. of Hartford, 37 S. C. 406, quoting with approval from Bishop, Cont. § 1391; and, as was held in Rodgers v. Mutual Endowment Assessment Assn., 17 S. C. 410, the cause of action on a contract arises at the place where it is to be performed. Where, then, was the contract made, upon which the plaintiff bases his action, if, indeed, there was any such contract?—a point which is not now before us, and upon which we do not desire to be regarded as even intimating any opinion. It does not appear that the plaintiff ever before had any pro-professional connection with the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, and, if made at all, it must be traceable to the telegram copied above; and that was sent from Boston, Mass. We cannot regard the written agreement between Tillinghast, Warren, and Smith, set out above, as any evidence of any contract on the part of the defendant company to pay anything. The fact that Mr. Warren was attorney for that company in a litigation then pending could not invest him with authority to bind his client to pay money, without some authority other than that arising from his professional relations; and, certainly, the terms of the telegram conferred no authority to enter into such agreement. Indeed, the terms of that paper do not show that Mr. Warren undertook to bind his client to pay any sum of money whatever. On the contrary, the agreement contained nothing more than a recital of the fact that the defendant company had agreed to pay the fee of Mr. Tillinghast; and whether that recital was strictly correct or not is not a question now to be considered. If, therefore, there was any agreement on the part of the defendant company to pay the plaintiff's fee, it must be found in the telegram above referred to; and, if it contains any promise to that effect, such promise was not made in this state, but in Boston, and, under the rule above referred to, must be there performed, as it is quite clear that there is nothing in the telegram indicating the contrary. Appellant, in his argument, seems to rely somewhat upon a letter printed in the "case," from the agent of the defendant company to Mr. Tillinghast, as tending to show that defendant acquiesced in the arrangement for the payment of plaintiff's fee. But, as we did not consider that the terms of that letter indicated any such acquiescence, we did not deem it important to set out that letter, in making our statement of the case. Still, we would be glad to have the letter incorporated in the report of the case, in deference to the views of its importance by appellant's counsel. But even if that letter contained a positive promise to pay the fee, or a direct admission of defendant's liability, such promise, whether express or implied, was not made in this state, but in the state of New Hampshire; and hence, under the rule above stated, the cause of action could not be regarded as arising in this state, as there is nothing in the letter indicating that such supposed promise was to be performed elsewhere.

As to the second question presented by the grounds of appeal, we deem it only necessary to say that we cannot understand how any contract can give rise to a cause of action until there has been some breach of such contract. The mere fact that a person has entered into a contract with another can give no cause of action, and none can arise until there is some breach of such contract, which, therefore, must be regarded as the cause of action. The contract may give a party the right to demand its performance according to its terms, but there is no delict, and no cause of action, until the other party refuses or neglects to perform some duty required of him by the terms of the contract. We do not think, therefore, that there was any error on the part of the circuit judge in holding that the breach of the contract constitutes the cause of action.

The third question presented by the grounds of appeal is more difficult, and is much more important than either of the other questions. The Code provides, in section 148, that "civil actions in the courts of record of this state shall be commenced by service of a summons," and in subsequent sections (155 and 156) proceeds to prescribe how such service shall be made. In section 155 the provision is that, if the action be against a corporation, it must be by delivery of a copy of the summons to certain officers or agents of the corporation, "but such service can be made, in respect to a foreign corporation only when it has property within this state, or the cause of action arose therein, or where such service shall be made within this state personally upon the president, cashier, treasurer, attorney or secretary thereof," followed by a special provision as to certain specified corporations, which have no application to the present case, as the defendant here is not one of the corporations specified. In section 156, provision is made for the service of the summons by publication in certain specified cases, the only one of which, applicable here, is couched in the following language: "Where the defendant is a foreign corporation, has property within the state, or the cause of action arose therein." That section contains this further provision: "Where publication is ordered, personal service of the summons out of the state is equivalent to publication," etc. Section 158 provides that in the case mentioned in section 156 the service of the summons shall be deemed complete at the expiration of the time prescribed by the order for publication. Section 159 provides how proof of the service of the summons shall be made, and contains this language: "When the service is made out of the state, after order of publication, the affidavit of the person making the service shall be made before the clerk of any court of record in the state or district in which such service shall be made, who shall certify the same under his official seal."—which was afterwards amended by the Act of 1884 (18 Stat. at L. 745), so as to include other officers besides such clerk. Section 160 provides that "from the time of the service of the summons in a civil action, or the allowance of a provisional remedy, the court is deemed to have acquired jurisdiction."

It must be admitted that, if we look alone to the provisions of the several sections of the code above referred to, there is strong ground for the position taken by appellant,—that, if the cause of action arose in this state, the court had acquired jurisdiction of the defendant corporation, for in view of the findings of Judge Hudson that the defendant was a foreign corporation, having no property within this state; that it was duly served with a copy of the summons in the state of New Hampshire, after order of publication has been made,—we must take the facts so found, and there is no room for the objection, taken in the argument, to the proof of service as lacking the official seal of the clerk, as no such exception was taken below. So that the naked question now presented is that, even assuming that the cause of action in this case arose in this state, whether the courts of this state could acquire jurisdiction of this foreign corporation, which had no property in this state, through which it might have been reached by a proceeding in rem, at least so far as such property was concerned, simply by personal service on such corporation in another state. This question, as it seems to us, has been conclusively settled in the negative by the highest authority in the case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565. In that case, Neff, being a nonresident of the state of Oregon, but owning property therein,—the land in question,—was sued on a money demand, in which action the state court of Oregon undertook to acquire jurisdiction of the person of Neff by publication under a statute of that state practically identical with our code in this respect and rendered judgment against him for the amount of such demand, and under the execution issued to enforce such judgment the land was sold by the sheriff, and bought by Pennoyer. Subsequently, an action was brought by Neff against Pennoyer to recover possession of the land in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon, and carried thence by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. The case turned upon the validity of the sale by the sheriff, or, rather, the validity of the judgment under which such sale was made; and the court held that the state court of Oregon could not acquire jurisdiction of the person of a nonresident defendant in a personal action simply by service by publication, and hence that the judgment was a nullity. As is said by Mr. Justice Field in delivering the opinion of the court, one of the well-established principles of public law respecting the jurisdiction of an independent state over persons and property is "that no state can exercise direct jurisdiction and authority over persons or property without its territory. Story, Conf. L. chap. 2; Wheat. International Law, pt. 2, chap. 2. The several states are of equal dignity and authority, and the independence of one implies the exclusion of power from all others; and so it is laid down by jurists, as an elementary principle, that the laws of one state have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as is allowed by comity, and that no tribunal established by it can extend its process beyond that territory, so as to subject either persons or property to its decisions." This doctrine does not deny or interfere with the right of a state to acquire jurisdiction over the property of a nonresident, located or found within such state, by a proceeding in rem,—for example, by attachment, or some proceeding in the nature of a proceeding in rem provided for by the laws of such state; but under such a proceeding no personal judgment can be rendered against the nonresident, and the judgment can only affect him so far as his property found in the state is concerned. See Stanley v. Stanley, 85 S. C. 94. The same 22 L. R. A.

doctrine had been previously laid down in Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 367, 868, 21 L. ed. 968, where it is said: "Even the court of king's bench in England, though a court of general jurisdiction, never imagined that it could serve process in Scotland, Ireland, or the colonies, to compel an appearance, or justify a judgment against persons residing therein at the time of the commencement of the suit." The case of Pennoyer v. Neff has not only been recognized and followed in numerous subsequent cases, but, so far as we are informed, has never been questioned by any tribunal. Even the learned judge (Mr. Justice Hunt) who dissented in that case did not question the doctrine for which we have cited the case, but based his dissent upon the sole ground that, inasmuch as Neff owned land within the state of Oregon at the time the action was commenced in which the judgment in question was recovered, it could be subjected to such judgment, even though no proceeding by attachment had been instituted. It is true that in that case the defendant was a natural person, and not, as here, a corporation, and that the service there was by publication, and not, as here, by personal service outside of the limits of the state. But neither of these circumstances can make any substantial difference between that case and this, for in the case of St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 27 L. ed. 223, the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff was applied to a case of a foreign corporation, and it is there said: "The doctrine of that case applies, in all its force, to personal judgments of state courts against foreign corporations." And we are unable to discover any reason why it should be otherwise. See also Mexican Cent. R. Co. v. Pinkney, 149 U. S. 194, 37 L. ed. 699, where the same doctrine was applied in the case of a foreign corporation.

The other point of difference amounts to nothing, for the statute of Oregon, like our statute, expressly declares, "Where publication is ordered personal service of the summons out of the state is equivalent to publication and deposit in the postoffice," thus putting the two modes of service precisely upon the same footing. Besides, in the case of Sugg v. Thornton, 182 U. S. 524, 33 L. ed. 447, where the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff was applied, the case shows that the party who objected to the jurisdiction of the Texas court on the ground that there had been no legal service upon him was actually served in Wyoming territory. It is apparent from what is said in other cases that the Supreme Court of the United States recognizes no difference in the two modes of service, so far as the question we are considering is concerned, for in Grover & Baker Sewing Mach. Co. v. Rudcliffe, 187 U. S. 294, 295, 34 L. ed. 672, it is said, upon the authority of Pennoyer v. Neff, and other cases there cited, "that a personal judgment is without validity, if rendered by a state court in an action upon a money demand against a nonresident of the state, upon whom no personal service of process, within the state, was made, and who did not appear." And in Wilson v. Seligman, 144 U. S. 44, 45, 36 L. ed. 339, the following passages from the opinion in Pennoyer v. Neff are quoted with approval: "Every state possesses exclusive jurisdiction and sovereignty over persons and property within its territory. . . . No state can exercise direct jurisdiction and authority over persons or property without its territory. . . . It is in virtue of the state's jurisdiction over the property of the nonresidents situated within its limits, that its tribunals can inquire into that nonresident's obligations to its own citizens, and the inquiry can then be carried only to the extent necessary to control the disposition of the property. . . . Where the entire object of the action is to determine the personal rights and obligations of the defendants, that is, where the suit is merely in personam, constructive service in this form upon a nonresident is ineffectual for any purpose. Process from the tribunals of one state cannot run into another state, and summon parties there domiciled to leave its territory, and respond to proceedings against them. . . . Process sent to him out of the state, and process published within it, are equally unavailing in proceedings to establish his personal liability. . . . A judgment which can be treated in any state of this Union as contrary to the first principles of justice and as an absolute nullity, because rendered without any jurisdiction of the tribunal over the party, is not entitled to any respect in the state where rendered. . . . To give such proceedings any validity, there must be a tribunal competent by its constitution, that is, by the law of its creation, to pass upon the subject-matter of the suit; and if that involves merely a determination of the personal validity of the defendant, he must be brought within its jurisdiction by service of process within the state, or his voluntary appearance."

These being the well-settled principles applicable to a case like the one now under consideration, established by the Supreme Court of the United States,—a tribunal which is invested with final jurisdiction in controversies between citizens of different states,—it seems to us that we are bound, if practicable, to put such a construction upon the provisions of our code, above referred to, as will bring it into conformity with such principles. This, we think, can be done by construing the above-mentioned provisions of our code as applying only to cases in which a warrant of attachment has been issued, or to some other proceeding in rem, or in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and not to cases of mere personal actions, in which only a personal judgment can be obtained, for it must be remembered that an action cannot now, as formerly, be commenced by a writ of foreign attachment, but that now, under the code, an attachment is merely a provisional remedy in aid of an action; and hence, to make it available, an action must be commenced in regular form, and judgment therein must be recovered before the attachment can yield the fruits which it is designed to produce. We are therefore compelled to construe the provisions of the code, above referred to, providing for the mode of making a nonresident a party to an action, as applying only to such actions as may be regarded as proceedings in rem, and not applying to merely personal actions, in which only a personal judgment is sought or can be obtained. This being a purely personal action, in which no warrant of attachment has been or could be obtained, inasmuch as the defendant has no property within this state, we think that the court never acquired jurisdiction of the defendant corporation, by service of the summons out of the state, and hence there was no error on the part of the circuit judge in dismissing the complaint for want of jurisdiction.

The second case mentioned in the title of this opinion—that of Mr. Moore—differs in at least one very material respect from the case just considered. Here the undisputed evidence is that the contract which constitutes the basis of plaintiff's action was made in this state by a duly authorized agent of the defendant corporation, and subsequently ratified by the general agent of said corporation; and, as there is nothing even tending to show that such contract was to be performed elsewhere, it must, under the rule announced in Tillinghast's Case, be regarded as a contract made and to be performed in this state, and hence that the cause of action arose in this state. If this were all, then a different conclusion from that reached in the case first considered would follow. But, under the views which we have taken of the third question presented by the appeal of Mr. Tillinghast, we are compelled to conclude that the court never acquired jurisdiction of the defendant corporation by a simple service of the summons in the state of New Hampshire, for in this case, as in the former, there was no warrant of attachment obtained, and none could have been, by reason of the undisputed fact that defendant, though a foreign corporation, had no property within the limits of this state. There was therefore no error on the part of the circuit judge in dismissing the complaint in this case for want of jurisdiction. For the reasons hereinbefore stated, we must adhere to the judgment rendered at the former hearing.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court in each of the cases stated in the title of this opinion be reaffirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

J. C. BULPIT, Appl.,

v.

T. J. MATTHEWS.

1. The owners of domestic animals are liable at common law for damages committed by them in trespassing, without regard to the negligence of the owner in permitting them to escape, or to the fact of enclosure, or lack of enclosure, of premises on which they are trespassing.
2. The common-law rule as to the duty of the owners of domestic animals to keep them from trespassing exists in Illinois, under the Act of 1874, except in districts where a vote taken under the statute has established the contrary rule, although for a long period of time the common-law rule was rejected in that state as inapplicable to its conditions.

3. It is a matter of common knowledge that in 1874, and long prior to that date, vacant land in Illinois was comparatively little, and to be found, not upon the prairies as a rule, but in poorer and timber portions of the state.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Christian County, which in turn affirmed a judgment of a justice of the peace in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused to plaintiff's crops by cattle belonging to defendant. Affirmed.

NOTE.—As to liability of owner for trespass of cattle.

General liability for trespassing stock.

The common-law doctrine that the owner of stock is liable in damages for trespasses by them, and that it is his duty to restrain them rather than the duty of the owner of land to fence against other persons' stock, has been much changed by statutes, and in some of the states has been denied as not applicable to the wants of the people in a new country. But the tendency of legislation in such states is to restore the common-law liability.

The common rule is that the owner of domestic animals must keep them on his own land, or else he will be liable for damages from their trespasses. Taber v. Cruthers, 59 Hun, 619, 39 N. Y. S. R. 331; Barto v. Stephan, 19 N. Y. Week. Dig. 164.

In an action for injuries to stock by a railroad train it was said that the common law requiring the owner of domestic animals to keep them on his premises does not apply to the Black Hills country. Sprague v. Fremont, E & M. V. R. Co. 6 Dak. 98.

Where plaintiffs, who controlled about 350,000 acres and grazed about 921,000 acres with cattle, attempted to enjoin the owners of sheep from allowing them to graze on the same, thus appropriating to themselves all the use of the public land, it was held that the owner of cattle is not liable for trespass on the unenclosed lands of another. Buford v. Houtz, 133 U. S. 320, 33 L. ed. 618.

In an action for injuries to stock from a railroad train, it was said that the common-law doctrine, requiring the owner of livestock to keep them on his premises, does not apply in Florida. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Geiger, 21 Fla. 609, 58 Am. Rep. 697.

In Colorado the owner of crops cannot recover for damages from trespassing cattle unless the crops are protected by a sufficient fence. Nuckolls v. Gaut, 12 Colo. 361; Morris v. Fraker, 5 Colo. 625.

In Nevada damages from trespassing cattle cannot be recovered where the field is not inclosed by the fence prescribed by statute, as the rule of common law is repugnant to the law of Nevada. Chase v. Chase, 15 Nev. 259.

An action of trespass for damage from cattle and sheep pasturing on unenclosed wild prairie land in Nebraska cannot be maintained, as the common law was not applicable to that state at the time of framing its constitution nor is it now. De-laney v. Erickson, 10 Neb. 492.

But Neb. Comp. Stat., art. 3, chap. 2, providing a remedy for trespass by livestock by impounding, is cumulative and does not exclude the remedy by 22 L. R. A.

an action for damages, as the injured party may waive his lien. Keith v. Tilford, 12 Neb. 271.

In North Carolina, in an action of replevin, it was said that the owner of stock is not required to restrain them, and is not responsible for their trespasses upon lands of others. Burgwyn v. Whitfield, 81 N. C. 281.

The same doctrine was declared also in an action for injuries to cattle from railroads. Laws v. North Carolina R. Co. 52 N. C. 468.

And another case decides that a planter not having his land protected cannot recover for trespass from stock. Jones v. Witherspoon, 52 N. C. 555, 73 Am. Dec. 293.

In Missouri in order to create a liability for trespassing cattle, the owner of the land must have his ground enclosed by a lawful fence as the common-law liability has been changed by statute. Held v. Grier, 12 Mo. App. 556; Fenton v. Montgomery, 19 Mo. App. 156; Storms v. White, 23 Mo. App. 31; Moore v. White, 45 Mo. 206.

In Ohio it is said that the doctrine of common-law liability for trespass by stock may be suitable to an old and highly cultivated country, where all the lands, except the public highways and commons, are under enclosure, but that it has no suitable and proper application in Ohio. Kerwacker v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. 3 Ohio St. 172, 62 Am. Dec. 246; Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Elliott, 4 Ohio St. 474.

In an action for damages to stock from a railroad train it was said that the rule of the common law requiring the owner of cattle to restrain them under pain of their being trespassers if found on unenclosed lands of another has been held to be the law in Wisconsin though it is generally disregarded by common consent in the newly settled parts of the state. McCall v. Chamberlain, 13 Wis. 640.

Where no regulation of stock or fence has been made under Wisconsin Act of February, 1841, allowing the towns to regulate the same, the common-law liability applies and the owner of a close may recover for trespasses by animals, although not inclosed by a sufficient fence. Stone v. Donaldson, 1 Pinney, 398.

In Arkansas, where stock was killed by a train, it was said that the common-law doctrine that the owner of cattle permitted to go at large and enter another's land is a trespasser, has never been recognized in that state. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Finley, 37 Ark. 562.

In Illinois the common law in regard to owners of stock being required to restrain them from trespassing was formerly held not to be in force, and that the owner of land to maintain an action for

It appeared that defendant kept the cattle in a pasture enclosed by a good and sufficient fence. That persons in the neighborhood used a way across the pasture to go to the village of Edinburg. That on the day on which the cattle escaped there was a show in the village, and during the night the gate to the pasture appeared to have been left open by some one passing through it, and the cattle escaped and strayed onto plaintiff's fields, which were unfenced, and inflicted the damage complained of.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. John G. Drennan and J. C. McBride, for appellant:

It was decided in the case of Seeley v. Peters, 10 Ill. 142, followed by a long line of decisions, that the common law of England, requiring every man to keep his stock on his own premises, at his peril, was not the law of this state, and that stock should be permitted to run at large, and that owners of land should fence against stock, and laws prescribing the sufficiency of fences were enacted (Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 54), and this has been the law of this state for many years and acted upon by the people. It was decided in Seeley v. Peters, 10 Ill. 142, that section 20 of chapter 54, then numbered 15, applied to outside fences as well as others, and was not limited in its application, and says "it necessarily follows that, unless the fence be good and sufficient, no action lies," etc. To dispense with this law as declared by the supreme court would require an act of the legislature, and only so much of this rule here announced would become extinct as would be expressly and in terms annulled by the legislature.

In 1874 an Act was passed entitled "An Act to Revise the Law in Relation to Permitting Animals to Run at Large," which provided the trespass of cattle upon his close, must, under the Illinois statutes, have it surrounded by a good and sufficient fence. Seeley v. Peters, 10 Ill. 130; Oil v. Rowley, 69 Ill. 469; Stoner v. Shugart, 45 Ill. 76; Misner v. Lighthall, 13 Ill. 609.

But Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874 changes this rule to the extent that it prohibits the running at large of cattle in the absence of a vote of the people of the county allowing them to do so.

And as shown in the main case the present Illinois statutes restore the common-law liability.

The owner of cattle is liable for the damages caused by them to his neighbor, under Ill. Rev. Stat., chap. 8, § 1, which practically re-enacts the common law in such counties as it is in force. Birket v. Williams, 30 Ill. App. 451.

Where a township has adopted a herd law prohibiting stock to run at large at night, to that extent it repeals the doctrine announced in Seeley v. Peters, 10 Ill. 130, and renders the owner of the stock liable for trespass, although the township law is in the nature of a penalty. Westgate v. Carr, 43 Ill. 450.

A party who permits his stock to run at large in violation of Illinois Act of January 13, 1872, is liable in trespass for damages by them to crops. Fredrick v. White, 73 Ill. 590.

In Alabama in an action for damages to stock from a defective bridge it was said that no general statute existed requiring cattle or dumb animals to be kept within an enclosure as the general rule is to fence stock out, not in. Lee County v. Yarbrough, 35 Ala. 590.

In Alabama the owner of land must protect himself against cattle by fence, except where local laws dispense with this requirement. Wilbrite v. Speakman, 79 Ala. 400.

But the Alabama Act of February 19, 1867, giving an action for damages against any one who permits his cattle to trespass within a tract surrounded by a lawful fence and making a boundary line a lawful fence in certain counties, restores the common-law liability in such counties. Joiner v. Winston, 68 Ala. 129.

Another Alabama case holds that the owner of hogs is liable for trespass committed by them on another's crop, although the owner of the hogs had no notice of their propensity to rove. Gresham v. Taylor, 51 Ala. 505.

Where a fence is not a lawful fence under the statute, in an action for injuries to the trespassing stock the defendant cannot recoup damages to his crops. Woodward v. Purdy, 20 Ala. 379.

This action was for trespass by the defendant in carrying away the hinges of the gates, digging up 22 L. R. A.

fruit trees, and taking away other things. The entry of the hogs must have been caused by this trespass but the facts do not appear.

In California premises must be protected by a fence prescribed by statute in order to permit an action for trespass of cattle thereon. Comerford v. Dupuy, 17 Cal. 308.

In California in an action against a railroad company for killing a horse it was held that the common-law liability for damages by trespassing stock does not prevail in that state. Waters v. Moss, 12 Cal. 535, 73 Am. Dec. 561.

In California the owner of sheep which stray into an unenclosed field without his knowledge, is not liable for an injury done by them, although Cal. Stat. 1861, p. 523, amended March 23, 1868, provides that it shall be unlawful to herd sheep on another's land. Logan v. Gedney, 38 Cal. 579.

See subhead "Driving cattle on land of another," infra.

But an owner of land is not required to fence it against cattle of another, in Santa Clara county, under the California Act of 1863, amended March, 1872. Hahn v. Garratt, 69 Cal. 144.

And the right given by statute in certain counties to proceed against trespassing cattle does not affect the right to sue their owner for damages. Triscony v. Brandenstein, 66 Cal. 514.

An action for trespass by animals that is not brought under the California Act of 1874 in certain counties may be brought in three years from the date of trespass. Heilbron v. Heinlen, 70 Cal. 482.

Where a complaint is either a declaration in trespass or it alleges "an express promise to pay the amount of damages done after the injury was consummated," an instruction that the law implies a promise by the owner of the stock to pay all damages done is error, there being no count for grain sold and delivered or for pasturage. Van Valkenburg v. McCauley, 63 Cal. 708.

The common-law remedy for trespass by cattle is not excluded by the other remedy of distress and sale under the New York statutes. Colden v. Eldred, 15 Johns. 220.

And the owner of cattle is liable for their trespass where there is no regulation of the town as to fences or cattle at large. Wells v. Howell, 19 Johns. 885.

The owner of sheep is liable for their breaking through a fence and depasturing a meadow, notwithstanding a town by-law allowing them to run at large on a common, unless it is shown that the plaintiff's fence was insufficient or did not conform to the regulation of the town prescribing the kind a penalty against those who should suffer their animals of the species of horse, mule, etc., to run at large.

Rev. Stat. chap. 8, § 1.

This statute applied only to those who suffered or permitted such animals to run at large, and had no application to such animals escaping against the will of the owner and without his fault or negligence, as in this case at bar, and set forth in the said propositions of law submitted to the court.

Kinder v. Gillespie, 68 Ill. 88; Collinsville v. Scanland, 58 Ill. 221; Fredrick v. White, 73 Ill. 590; Weide v. Thiel, 9 Ill. App. 226.

Messrs. Ricks & Creighton, for appellee:

By the common law every man was bound to keep his cattle on his own land or respond in damages for their trespass, and it was one of the rules that no man was bound to fence his close, but every man is bound to keep his cattle in his own field at his peril.

of fence if any such regulation was made. White v. Scott, 4 Barb. 56.

The owner of cattle is liable for damages caused by them where they are in a pasture of another and, by reason of an insufficient fence which such party was bound to repair, they trespass on adjoining land. The statute imposing certain liability on adjoining owners does not take away the common-law liability of the owners of cattle. Stafford v. Ingersoll, 3 Hill, 38.

But in an action for damages from trespassing hogs, the plaintiff cannot in the same action recover for feed furnished the hogs while they were kept by him in his pen. North v. McDonald, 47 Barb. 528.

If the owner of the land fails to use ordinary care to protect his crops and drive out trespassing stock, he cannot recover for subsequent damage. Woodmansee v. Kinnicutt, 30 N. Y. Week. Dig. 512.

In Vermont owners of cattle are required to confine their cattle on their own lands, notwithstanding the Vermont statutes in respect to fences between uncoupled land, and are liable for trespasses by them. Keenan v. Cavanaugh, 44 Vt. 263.

And the plaintiff in trespass need not show that he has a legal fence, where the defendant, whose cattle have trespassed, does not claim that it is defective. Sorenberger v. Houghton, 40 Vt. 150.

The Pennsylvania Act of 1700, providing that the owner of cattle is liable for damage done in enclosure that is fenced according to law, implies that there is no liability unless such fence is used. Gregg v. Gregg, 55 Pa. 227.

The Pennsylvania Act of 1700, in regard to the fence law was repealed by Pennsylvania Act of April 4, 1889, which repeal left the rights of land-owners and cattlemen as at common law, and the owner of cattle must fence them in, and is liable for damages to his neighbor's crops by his cattle. Barber v. Mensch, 157 Pa. 390; Arthurs v. Chatfield, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 34, 21 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 83; Thompson v. Kyler, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 205, 8 Lanc. L. Rev. 246.

And in Warren county, Pennsylvania, the owner of cleared land is not bound to protect the same against cattle of others. Greenlee v. Eisenbrown, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 483.

And the owner of property that is damaged by trespassing animals may maintain an action of trespass qu. cl. fr. against their owner. Ziegler v. Hons, 6 Kulp, 374, 1 Pa. Dist. Rep. 609, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 159.

The Pennsylvania Act of 1706 prohibits swine from running at large without rings in their noses 22 L. R. A.

McCormick v. Tate, 20 Ill. 334.

The owner (says Blackstone, 3d vol. 211) is answerable for the trespass of his stock as of himself.

Starr & Curtis, Stat., chap. 8, § 1, entitled "Animals Running at Large" provides: "that whoever, being the owner or having possession of any domestic animal of the species of horse, mule, ass, cattle, sheep, goat, or swine, shall suffer the same to run at large except when authorized as hereinafter provided, shall be fined not less than $3 nor more than $10 for each offense."

The above statute restores the common law.

Lee v. Burk, 15 Ill. App. 651; Birket v. Williams, 80 Ill. App. 451; Westgate v. Carr, 48 Ill. 450.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The propositions submitted to be held by the trial court as the law, and refused to be sufficient to prevent turning up the ground and yokes on their necks extending at least six inches from the angular point or corner. Stewart v. Benninger, 138 Pa. 437.

And the act authorizing the holding of trespassing cattle does not prevent a recovery for damages done by swine running at large. Robison v. Fetterman (Pa.) May 14, 1888.

In the absence of statute a party is not required to fence his lands before he can maintain an action of damages for trespass by cattle thereon. French v. Cresswell, 13 Or. 418.

In this case the local law of Umatilla county required no fence against sheep, and the dictum in Campbell v. Bridwell, 5 Or. 311, that the common law had been changed by statute is explained by saying that the court did not intend to hold that in the absence of the statute a party would be obliged to fence his land before he could maintain an action for damages from trespass by cattle thereon; and it is held in this case that the common law prevails where not changed by statute.

The fence laws of Oregon requiring fields and enclosures to be protected with certain kinds of fence do not apply to ditches, and the owner of sheep is liable for injuries by them to unfenced ditches, in the absence of proof that the sheep were purposely or negligently driven thereon. Bileu v. Paisley, 4 L. R. A. 840, 18 Or. 47.

See subhead, infra, "Driving cattle on land."

The common-law rule requiring the owner of cattle to restrain them does not apply in Iowa. One who sues for injury to his crops by cattle must show that he had a lawful fence. Frazier v. Nortinus, 34 Iowa, 82; Wagner v. Bissell, 3 Iowa, 396.

The Iowa Code, § 912, providing that the owner of the beast is liable for damages except where the injured party failed in his duty to keep up partition fences, applies to partition fences only, and as to outside fences the common law is not in force. Wagner v. Bissell, supra.

But under Iowa Laws 1870, chap. 23, providing that the owner of stock trespassing on the lands of another shall pay the damages, the liability attaches without regard to whether the land is fenced or not. Hallock v. Hughes, 42 Iowa, 516; Little v. McGuire, 38 Iowa, 500, 43 Iowa, 447.

But the owner of crops being injured must exercise ordinary care and cannot recover for such damage as he might have thus prevented, as where the gaps were small and the cattle were known to be trespassing and could easily have been driven out. Little v. McGuire, supra.

When cattle broke through where defendant's held, fairly present the question whether the owners of domestic animals in this state are required by law to keep them under control, that no damage is done by them to the property of another, at their peril. The circuit court, in effect, held that it was not necessary to fence against stock, but that the owner thereof is liable in damages if they trespass upon the lands of others, whether such land is enclosed or not, and irrespective of the reason or excuse for the animals being at large.

By the common law every owner of cattle was bound to keep them from trespassing upon the close of another, at his peril, and was answerable for their trespasses, as for his own. 8 Bl. Com. 211; 2 Waterman, Trespass, § 858; Cooley, Torts, 337. By section 1, chap. 28, Rev. Stat., of this state, "the common law of England, so far as the same is applicable, and of a general nature, and all statutes or acts of the British parliament made in aid of, and to supply the defects of, the common law, prior to the fourth year of James the First, [with certain specified exceptions,] and which are of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until repealed by legislative authority." This statute, without the exceptions, was passed by the general convention of the colony of Virginia, May, 1776 (9 Hen. Stat. 127), and in its present form was carried into the legislature of the Indiana territory by the Act of September 7, 1807 (Laws 1807, chap. 24), was in force in the territory of Illinois (1 Pope's Laws, Ill. T. p. 34), and was re-enacted by the first state legislature by Act of February 4, 1819 (Laws 1819, p. 3), and has been retained, in the same form, in each succeeding revision of the statute. The question whether the fence was unlawful and through plaintiff's fence where it was lawful, the fact that other parts of plaintiff's fence were not lawful, will not bar a recovery in Iowa, as Code, § 1449, provides that the owner of animals and the owner of land are both liable where animals escape into the injured enclosure in consequence of the negligence of the adjoining owner to maintain his part of the partition fence. Noble v. Chase, 60 Iowa, 261.

In an action for an assault, it is said that the Iowa Rev., § 1551, and section 1548, provide two distinct remedies for trespassing animals, one by appraisal and one by action. Quinton v. Van Tuyl, 30 Iowa, 554.

Where there is no order permitting stock to run at large, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4895, the owner of such stock is liable for trespass by them without regard to a lawful fence. Atkinson v. Mott, 102 Ind. 431.

The owner of cattle is liable for their trespasses unless they escape through defects in the fence that the injured party is bound to keep in repair. Page v. Hollingsworth, 7 Ind. 317.

Owners of cattle at common law were liable for their trespasses, but are not liable where the statute requires the owner of 'ands to fence against cattle. Myers v. Dodd, 9 Ind. 290, 68 Am. Dec. 624.

Under the Indiana Act of March 12, 1877, amending section 2 of Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 495, no action for trespass of animals can be maintained unless they broke through a lawful fence. Clark v. Stipp, 75 Ind. 114.

In the absence of an order of the board of county commissioners permitting cattle to run at large under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2637, every owner is required to fence in his own stock, and is not bound to fence out other stock, and the owner of cattle is liable for any trespass by them without regard to quality of fence or whether the cattle are breachy. Stone v. Kopka, 100 Ind. 458.

If the defendant was bound to maintain the part of the fence through which his cattle entered he was liable without regard to whether the cattle were breachy or not. If the plaintiff was bound to maintain the fence the defendant was liable unless he showed that the plaintiff had failed in his duty. The rule of liability is fixed by the statute. Potter v. Danforth, 1 Alb. L. J. 255.

In an action for injuries to cattle from railroad trains it was said that the common law requiring every man to keep his cattle upon his own land is in force in Minnesota. Looke v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co. 15 Minn. 350.

Exemplary damages for trespass by animals cannot be recovered, even where the defendant rescues them when plaintiff is holding the stock for the trespass. Sherman v. Kilpatrick, 58 Mich. 310.

No action will lie in Kansas for injuries by trespassing cattle unless the ground is enclosed with such a fence as is required by Taylor's Kan. Stat., chap. 40, defining a legal enclosure. Darling v. Rodgers, 7 Kan. 562.

This is true even if the owner of the stock was negligent unless his want of care was willful, wanton, or malicious. Larkin v. Taylor, 5 Kan. 434.

But where cattle break through a lawful fence and do injury, the owner of the land may recover damages or hold the cattle for damages, as provided in Taylor's Kan. Gen. Stat., par. 3033, as this remedy is cumulative. Prather v. Beeve, 23 Kan. 627.

In a township in Kansas, where the hog law is the same as the common law, it is no defense to an action for damages to a crop that it was not enclosed by a legal fence. Wells v. Beal, 9 Kan. 567.

In Kansas to recover for damages from swine, the aggrieved party must show that the fields were in a township where the hog law was in force. Scott v. Lingren, 21 Kan. 124.

The owner of stock is not liable for damages committed by such stock, where he turns them into his own field, and they wander out from there to an unenclosed field not used by him, and break into the premises of another through a fence that is not sufficient as required by statutes of Kansas. Fillmore v. Booth, 29 Kan. 134.

The owner of stock in Georgia is liable for damages to land or crops injured by them except in those counties where the herd law does not prevail, and where provision is made for impounding cattle this is only cumulative and is not the exclusive remedy. Bonner v. De Loach, 78 Ga. 50.

Where a river is the dividing line so that a fence cannot be well kept up or maintained on the dividing line, the owner of cattle must prevent them from going on his neighbor's land, as this is not provided for by statute. Bissel v. Southworth, 1 Root, 299.

Where cattle are rightfully on commons thrown open by the towns under the statute, the owner of cattle is not liable for trespass by them where there is no fence. Holladay v. Marsh, 3 Wend. 142, 20 Am. Dec. 678.

In order to recover damages done by horses and cattle if the party intends to recover under the fence statute he must show that his fence was lawful, that the horse got over and did damage, and that the appraisers were chosen. Brittin v. Van Camp, 3 N. J. L. 240.

rule of the common law mentioned was in force in this state first came before this court at its December term, 1848, in Seeley v. Peters, 10 Ill. 130; and it was there held, by a divided court, never to have been in force. It was held, following the construction placed upon the statute adopting the common law in Boyer v. Sweet, 4 Ill. 121, and Penny v. Little, Id. 801, that the common law was adopted and in force "only in cases where that law is applicable to the habits and condition of your society, and in harmony with the genius, spirit, and objects of your institutions." After showing the then unsettled condition of the vast prairies of the state, the scarcity of timber to fence them, and their capability to sustain thousands of cattle upon the natural grasses, the court said, "However well adapted the rule of the common law may be to a densely populated country, like England, it is surely but illy adapted to a new country, like ours," and after showing the universal habit at that time of enclosing fields devoted to agriculture, and permitting stock to run at large, further says, "We should feel inclined to hold, independent of any statute upon the subject, on account of the inapplicability of the common-law rule to the condition and circumstances of our people, that it does not and never has prevailed in Illinois." But the court, in that case, distinctly placed its decision upon the ground that the legislature, by the enactment of various statutes relating to fences and enclosures, expressly recognized the right of owners of domestic animals to permit them to run at large, and had, as then held, required the proprietors of fields to surround them with a good and sufficient fence before they could maintain an action for the trespass of stock therein. It followed, necessarily, from the construction given these

In an action for damages to stock from railroad trains it was said that in Mississippi the owner of cattle is not liable for damage done by them to his neighbor, whose premises are not enclosed by a lawful fence. Vicksburg & J. R. Co. v. Patton, 31 Miss. 156, 66 Am. Dec. 552.

A person cultivating land in common with others, is liable for trespass of cattle of a stranger, which he permits to mingle with his own and trespass, although he had enclosed his land on three sides leaving only that next to his neighbor open, under Miss. Code 1880, § 984, providing for liability for trespasses of cattle breaking through a lawful fence or running at large in a common enclosure within which more than one person is cultivating land, without the consent of all such persons. Montgomery v. Handy, 62 Miss. 16.

Where cattle that are used in making a road stray on unenclosed land against the will of their owner, it is not a trespass. Cool v. Crommet, 18 Me. 250.

From the highway.

The owner of stock which trespass on land from the highway must show that they were lawfully on the road before he will be excused for their trespass. Dovaston v. Payne, 2 H. Bl. 627.

And the occupant of land cannot recover for damages from cattle entering his land from the highway through his defective fence where stock is on the highway, under N. Y. 1 Rev. Stat., § 40, § 41, § 5, subsec. 11, authorizing towns to determine the time and manner when stock shall be permitted to go at large on the highways. Griffin v. Martin, 7 Barb. 207.

If A. has a close next the highway, and beasts come out of the highway into the close of A. and thence they go into a close of B. adjoining, and which B. ought to fence, then in default of enclosure, etc., it is a good plea against A. but not against B. or another stranger. Harvey v. Gulson, Noy, 107, 36 Hen. VI., barre. 168.

In an action for holding cattle it was said that if cattle are passing along the highway and enter through an insufficient fence the owner of the cattle must remove them in a reasonable time. Goodwyn v. Cheveley, 4 Hurlst. & N. 631.

The owner of cattle driving them along the highway is not liable for their escape to adjoining lands, when he drives them back as quickly as possible. Rightmire v. Shepard, 36 N. Y. S. R. 768. New York Laws 1867, chap. 814, § 2, to prevent animals being at large on the highway, and giving a remedy for cattle trespassing, do not apply to stock of an adjoining owner crossing a division fence. Jones v. Sheldon, 50 N. Y. 477.

A landowner failing to keep a division fence in repair is not liable for trespasses to his neighbor from cattle unlawfully on the highway that cross such fence. Pool v. Alger, 11 Gray, 489, 71 Am. Dec. 726.

But the owner of cattle cannot excuse the trespass by his stock through insufficient fences, where he has unlawfully turned them into the highway to graze. Stackpole v. Healy, 16 Mass. 33, 6 Am. Dec. 121.

So the owner of swine is liable for their trespass in breaking through a defective fence from the highway. Harrison v. Brown, 5 Wis. 27.

The owner of a close being only bound under the New Hampshire statute to fence against creatures rightfully on the adjoining land, one whose horse, which had been turned loose to graze, entered from the highway the field of another through a defective fence, is liable for the trespass unless the highway is on the defendant's land, or unless it was plaintiff's duty to repair the fence. Avery v. Maxwell, 4 N. H. 36.

In an action of replevin for cattle held for trespass it was said that the general rule of law is that every man is bound to keep his cattle upon his own land at his peril; excepting (1) he may drive them along the highway; (2) he will not be liable to the adjoining neighbor if his cattle escape over a fence that such neighbor was bound to repair, but he will be liable to a third party whose field lies beyond if they trespass there; and (3) the New Hampshire Statute of February 8, 1791, is construed to require the owners of closes to fence them against all creatures lawfully on the highway. Mills v. Stark, 4 N. H. 512, 17 Am. Dec. 444.

The owner of adjoining land not maintaining his part of the division fence which he was bound to do, is not liable for trespasses over the same of cattle of third parties coming on his land from the highway and crossing that fence, notwithstanding N. H. Rev. Stat., chap. 186, § 12, providing for damages for failure to maintain a partition fence that a party is bound to keep in repair. Lawrence v. Combs, 37 N. H. 381, 72 Am. Dec. 382.

Cattle are not lawfully on unfenced land which they enter from a highway on which they were lawfully at large, by passing through adjoining land where the Maine statute provides merely that if beasts are lawfully on adjoining lands and escape therefrom in consequence of the negligence of the injured party to maintain his part of a partition statutes, that the common-law rule was not in force. In the subsequent cases of Misner v. Lighthall, 13 Ill. 609; Chicago & M. R. Co. v. Patchin, 16 Ill. 198, 61 Am. Dec. 65; McCormick v. Tate, 20 Ill. 384; and other cases,—the question was more or less directly presented, and the holding in Seeley v. Peters considered and approved. The question was again directly presented in Headen v. Rust, 39 Ill. 186 (determined at the December term, 1866, of this court). The court there recognizing that the conditions which led the court to hold, in 1848, the principle of the common law inapplicable, because of the physical and social conditions and habits of the people, no longer existed, the decision was placed upon the ground that the law, as declared in Seeley v. Peters, had been so long acquiesced in by the people, and the rule recognized by the legislature in the passage of various acts consistent with the holding in that case, that it belonged to the legislative department of government, more properly than the judiciary, to change it. And after reviewing various of such acts it was said: "This legislation established the fact that the general assembly and the people of the state understand the law to require owners of land to fence against the depredations of stock, and that all persons have a right to permit their stock to run at large on the highways and commons, except so far as they are prohibited by legislative enactment. . . . The conclusion from these enactments seems irresistible that the people have accepted the rule in Seeley v. Peters as the law, and have manifested no disposition to disturb it, except in particular localities." A review of the legislation referred to, or the enactments subsequently, prior to the Act of 1872, and relating to fences and enclosures, and regulating the right of stock to run at large in fence, the owner of the beasts shall not be liable. Lord v. Wormwood, 29 Me. 282, 50 Am. Dec. 586. See also Cool v. Crommet, 13 Me. 260; Hartford v. Brady, infra.

Driving cattle on land of another.

Generally the owner of stock is liable for damages done by them when he herds or drives them on the land of another against the will of the owner of the land.

"A man is answerable for not only his own trespass but that of his cattle also; for, if by his negligent keeping they stray upon the land of another (and much more if he permits, or drives them on), and they there tread down his neighbor's herbage, and spoil his corn or his trees, this is a trespass for which the owner must answer in damages." 3 Bl. Com. 200.

Trespass may be maintained by one whose land is not enclosed against a party herding stock thereon after being forbidden. Bedden v. Clark, 76 Ill. 888.

Where by the custom in Colorado sheep are not required to be fenced against but are herded, one whose crops are injured by the negligence of the herder of sheep may recover damages. Willard v. Mathesus, 7 Colo. 76.

The owner of cattle which are driven on unenclosed land against the will of the owner of land is liable in trespass, notwithstanding the Iowa law in regard to stock being allowed to run on unenclosed land. Harrison v. Adamson, 76 Iowa 337.

A party may recover damages for herding cattle on his land without his consent, although the whole tract may not be improved. Otis v. Morgan, 61 Iowa, 712.

So a party is liable for depasturing land with his cattle after a license to allow them to pasture had been withdrawn. Stone v. Walt, 50 Vt. 663.

In an action to restrain a party from turning in his cattle it was said that the common-law rule as to liability for damage done by stock on the land of another does not apply in Texas, but if a man enclose his land his enclosure must be respected even if there is not a statutory fence. Davis v. Davis, 70 Tex. 123. See also Pace v. Potter, infra.

In an action for damages by cattle to growing crops, it is no defense that they were not enclosed by a legal fence, where the owners of the cattle drove them on the premises, and were guilty of a wanton and willful want of care. Powers v. Kindt, 18 Kan. 74.

One who drives his cattle through a breach in the fence, upon another's land, where the fence has been thrown down without the owner's fault, 22 L. R. A.

is liable for damages done by the cattle. Erbes v. Wehmeyer, 60 Iowa, 86.

Where a party turns cattle in an enclosure by permission of another believing that the latter owns all the land enclosed, he will be liable for damages to the crops of a third party owning land enclosed therein. Daniels v. Aholtz, 81 Ill. 440.

If a man drive his cattle over a fence into the field of another he is liable in trespass. Adams v. McKinney, Add. Rep. 266.

If cattle on unfenced land go across it to the unfenced land of another the owner of the cattle can drive them back again over the same premises. The rule of law in Iowa is that cattle may go upon unfenced land of others. Camp v. Fisherty, 26 Iowa, 620.

The owner of cattle is not liable for damages committed by them where they were driven on plaintiff's premises by a third party without the knowledge or consent of the owner. Hartford v. Brady, 114 Mass. 466, 19 Am. Rep. 877.

In this case the cattle were being driven along the highway and entering the land of one party were driven by him on the land of another.

See subhead, "From the highway," supra.

If sheep strayed on unenclosed land, or were driven there for pasturage and not maliciously, the owner of them is not liable for damages, in Montana, as Mont. Comp. Stat., 5th div., § 1119, subjecting owners of animals to liability for damage by breaking through a lawful fence, negatives the liability of the owner for their being at large. Fant v. Lyman, 9 Mont. 61. See also Logan v. Gedney, 38 Cal. 579; Bileu v. Paisley, 4 L. R. A. 840, 18 Or. 47.

Lack of division fences.

The general rule is that each adjoining owner is liable to the other for damages by his stock, where there is no division or apportionment of a partition fence by assignment, prescription, agreement, or statute.

Parsons, Ch. J., in Rust v. Low, 6 Mass. 94, makes the following deductions which have been largely quoted, commended, and followed:

"1. One is not obliged to fence against adjoining landowners except by prescription.

"2. Where he is so compelled he need not fence against cattle of other than adjoining neighbor.

"3. A man is obliged to keep his cattle at home though not bound to fence against his neighbor.

"4. The obligation of joining tenants rests on statutes.

"5. An assignment pursuant to statute imposes the same duty as prescription.

"6. Where there is no prescription or agreement certain municipalities and political subdivisions of the state, will be unnecessary. It will be found that they recognize the law to be as held in the cases mentioned, and that acts of the legislature authorizing the restraining of domestic animals from running at large in such municipalities and subdivisions formed exceptions to the general rule and policy of the state.

But by the statute now in force (Rev. Stat. chap. 8), passed in 1874, which is, in effect, sections 1 and 2 of the Act of 1872, (rewritten,) a radical change was made. Of the causes producing the rapid development of the state, nothing need be said; but it is a matter of common knowledge that at the time of the passage of the present statute, and long prior to that date, if there was vacant land upon which cattle at large might graze, it was not, as a rule, to be found upon the prairies, but in the poorer and timbered portions of the state, and there in only comparatively small, and constantly decreasing, quantities. The conditions and circumstances of the country and people had radically changed since the decision of the Seeley v. Peters case, and the reasons for rejecting the rule of the common law, so far as its exclusion was based upon the physical condition of the state, and the needs and habits of the people, had ceased to exist. It cannot be doubted that it was in view of these changed conditions, and, it may be presumed, in view of the holding in Headen v. Rust, that the legislation of 1874 upon the subject was enacted. Section 1 of the Act of 1874 imposes a penalty upon any person suffering or permitting domestic animals to run at large within the state, except when authorized as in that act provided. Section 2 provides for submitting the question of permitting animals to run at large to a vote of the electors the statute only requires the tenant to fence against cattle rightfully on adjoining land."

He corrects a citation which is often misquoted and says Jenk. & Cent. Ca. 5, from Fitz. Abr. Bar. 163, as to 38 Hen. VI., gives the correct translation: "If A. has green acre adjoining his own close black acre which A. ought to fence against, if B's cattle go from his black acre to A's white acre, and then to A's green acre, this is no trespass because A. did not fence his white acre against B's black acre."

"If A. be bound to enclose against B. and B. against C. and beasts escape out of C's land into B's land, and hence into the land of A., in this case A. shall not have trespass against C. But if A. be bound to enclose against B. and B's beast escape into A's land, and thence into the land of one D. a stranger, then D. shall have trespass and B. be put to a curia claudenda against A." F. N. B. 123. Vin. Abr. title Fence.

"If A. has land on one side of a very large field, and ought to fence against it; and B. has land on the other side, and ought to fence against it; if the beasts of A. enter into the field, and thence into the close of B. and for default of the fence of B. yet B. may have trespass against A. and so vice versa." Br. Curia Claud. pl. 2; Vin. Abr. title Fence.

Where A. B. and C. adjoin each other in that order, A. can recover in trespass for damages from C's sheep, and A. is not bound to fence against them, and not being an adjoining proprietor to C. the statutes in regard to fences do not apply. Wilder v. Wilder, 38 Vt. 373.

In an action of replevin for holding cattle it was said that each adjoining owner is liable for damages from his cattle on lands of the other, where neither is under obligation to fence. Churchill v. Evans, 1 Taunt. 529.

Each adjoining land proprietor is bound to keep his cattle on his own land at his peril, where there has been no statutory assignment of a partition fence between the parties. Myers v. Dodd, 9 Ind. 290, 68 Am. Dec. 624; Bradbury v. Gifford, 53 Me. 99.

The adjoining proprietors are remitted to their common-law rights and obligations to keep their cattle on their own land where there never was any division fence located by viewers or by agreement, and the failure of one party to fence is no defense in an action for damages from cattle of adjoining owner. Angell v. Hill, 45 N. Y. S. R. 32.

Where there is no prescription, agreement, statute, or assignment, of division fence no tenant is bound to fence against an adjoining close; but in such case, there being no fence, each owner is bound at his peril to keep his cattle on his own close. Thayer v. Arnold, 4 Met. 589; Gooch v. 23 L. R. A.

In Maine if there is no obligatory division fence between adjoining landowners, each must keep his cattle on his own land. Sturtevant v. Merrill, 33 Me. 62.

The rule of the common law prevails where stock enters from adjoining fields and the fence is not a division fence under the statute, and the owner of hogs is liable in damages in such a case for not restraining them on his own land. McBride v. Lynd, 55 Ill. 411.

Where wheat has been sown in a field and not separated by a fence from the remainder of the field, the owner of the wheat may recover for damages thereto by cattle kept by another on the other part of the farm, as adjoining owners are equally bound to maintain a partition fence, and where neither does the common-law rule of liability apply. Stephenson v. Elliott, 3 Ind. App. 233.

In replevin for holding cattle it was said that the Michigan Act March 17, 1847, providing for no damages from beasts unless they are prohibited by the township from being at large except where the land is enclosed with a lawful fence, applies only to exterior fences and an adjoining landowner is liable to the other for trespass from his cattle where there is no partition fence. Johnson v. Wing, 3 Mich. 163.

Where no division is made of a partition fence as is contemplated by statute, and the part and share of each remains undefined, the common law prevails, and the owner of cattle is liable for their trespass on the land of the other. Coxe v. Robbins, 9 N. J. L. 477.

The owner of stock willfully allowing it to run at large in a field enclosed in common with that of an adjoining proprietor, is liable to him in damages for injuries to his crops, and it is no defense that the outside fence was not a lawful fence. Broadwell v. Wilcox, 22 Iowa, 566, 32 Am. Dec. 404.

Where land is enclosed in common, by agreement, this releases each party from obligation to build a partition fence, and each is liable to the other for damages from his cattle. Winters v. Jacobs, 29 Iowa, 115; Montgomery v. Handy, 63 Miss. 43; Milligan v. Wehinger, 68 Pa. 235.

Where two owners of adjoining lands fence their land in common, but have no partition fence, the owner of each tract is liable for trespasses committed by his cattle on the other's land. Baker v. Robbins, 9 Kan. 303; Markin v. Priddy, 40 Kan. 684, overruling Markin v. Priddy, 39 Kan. 463; O'Riley v. Diss, 41 Mo. App. 134.

of the county. Section 3 relates to the form of the ballot, manner of voting, and canvassing and return of the votes. Section 4 provides: "If a majority of all votes cast in the county at such election shall be for domestic animals, or any species thereof, running at large, it shall be lawful in such county, for domestic animals, or such species thereof, to run at large: provided, that if at any such election the vote in any precinct in counties not under township organization, or in any town in counties under township organization, or in any incorporated city, village, or town in any county, shall be against domestic animals, or any species thereof, running at large, it shall not be lawful for such animals to run at large in such precinct or town, or incorporated city, village, or town." Section 5 provides that, in any county wherein animals are allowed to run at large pursuant to a vote theretofore had, on petition, etc., being filed with the county clerk, a vote may be taken in any incorporated city or village, precinct or town, under the act, and, if a majority of the votes cast shall be against animals running at large, then it shall not be lawful for them to run at large in such city, village, precinct, or town. Section 6 provides that the act shall not be construed so as to prohibit the running at large of domestic animals in any county, precinct, or town, incorporated city or village, "where the same is allowed pursuant to any election held by virtue of any law in force at the time this act shall take effect." Vogt v. Dunley, 97 Ill. 424.

Construing these provisions together, it is manifest, we think, that the legislature intended that only as the result of an election at which the question had been submitted under the provisions of this, or some prior statute authorizing it, can domestic animals

The common law still prevails in Missouri as to such fences when not changed by prescription or agreement, and the owner of stock is liable for trespasses by the same on his adjoining neighbor. O'Riley v. Diss, supra.

But in Texas where unenclosed land of adjoining owners is enclosed by a general enclosure of surrounding owners, one of such adjoining owners is not liable to the other for trespass of his cattle on account of not having a division fence. The rule of common law requiring the owner of cattle to confine them on his land does not prevail in Texas. Pace v. Potter, 85 Tex. 473. See Davis v. Davis, 70 Tex. 123.

And where adjoining lands which have once belonged to different persons, one of whom was bound to repair the fences between the two, afterwards become the property of the same person, the pre-existing obligation to repair the fences is destroyed by the unity of ownership. Boyle v. Tamlyn, 6 Barn. & C. 329.

Removal of division fence.

A person who sows a crop after the fence protecting the land has been removed cannot recover for damages to his crop by cattle. (It does not appear whose fence was removed by the defendant, but it was a division fence, and it does not appear whose cattle damaged the crop.) Hassa v. Junger, 15 Wis. 598.

Where there is an inner and outer fence in a field a party who has not the exclusive right therein cannot remove the inner fence and expose his crops without suffering the consequences of the damages. Buckmaster v. Cool, 12 Ill. 76. See McCormick v. Tate, infra.

A partition fence cannot be removed until the parties interested in its remaining are notified. McCormick v. Tate, 20 Ill. 334.

This case approves Buckmaster v. Cool, supra, which seems to oppose Seeley v. Peters, 10 Ill. 130, but Buckmaster v. Cool limits and qualifies the other to stock on the highway and commons and leaves the common law applicable to inside fences.

A party wrongfully removing a division fence is liable to the adjoining owner for damages done by cattle in consequence thereof. Deimel v. Obert, 20 Ill. App. 557.

A party removing a partition fence without giving the three months' notice required by statute is liable for damages sustained thereby to the crops. Richardson v. M'Dougall, 11 Wend. 46.

No recovery can be had in trespass qu. cl. fr. for damages to crops by cattle, caused by the removal of a fence, without showing how it was erected or that defendant's cattle trespassed. Richardson v. Milburn, 11 Md. 340.

Damages for loss of crop may be recovered in an action of trespass vi et armis for removing a fence. Hardin v. Kennedy, 2 McCord, L. 277.

If one proprietor of a line fence take down a portion and notify the other to remove his cattle which he neglects to do, but shortly afterwards removes the remainder of the fence, he is liable for a subsequent trespass by his cattle on the other's land. Van Slyck v. Snell, 6 Lana. 299.

Where the defendant built his fence near the line on his own land and removed part of a line fence leaving a gap in plaintiff's field, it was the duty of the plaintiff to protect his crops in a reasonable time otherwise the defendant would not be liable. Smith v. Johnson, 76 Pa. 191.

Defects in partition fences.

An action either of case or trespass lies if the cattle of an adjoining owner trespassed on the other, where it was the duty of the owner of the cattle to fence. Star v. Rookesby, 1 Salk. 386.

This liability exists although the trespass is due to a breach in the fence made in the night-time by some party unknown. Kron v. Kirkendall, 1 Alb. L. J. 238.

Where horses break through defendant's portion of a division fence which is defective, a recovery may be had although plaintiff's part of such fence is also defective. Osburn v. Adams, 70 Ill. 291.

A person is not liable for cattle not under his control passing through his land on to that of another. Cook v. Morea, 33 Ind. 497.

The Michigan Laws, 1861, p. 291, providing that damages shall not be recovered for trespass by a beast where the partition fences are lawful, does not apply unless the adjoining proprietor improves his land, nor unless a portion of the division fence has been assigned to him to keep it in repair. The mere fact of an insufficient fence between adjoining premises will not bar a recovery as one adjoining owner is not bound to keep up the fence unless apportioned. Aylesworth v. Herrington, 17 Mich. 417.

The owner of land who fails to perform his duty in keeping up his share of a division fence, cannot recover in trespass for damages done by trespassing animals resulting therefrom. Webber v. Cloason, 35 Me. 26; D'Arcy v. Miller, 86 Ill. 102, 29 Am. Rep. 11; Rangler v. McCreight, 27 Pa. 95; Phelps v. Cousins, 29 Ohio St. 135; Northcott v. Smith, 4 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 555; Shepherd v. Hees, 12 Johns. 439; Roach v. Lawrence, 56 Wis. 478; Keenan v. Cavanaugh, 44 Vt. 238; Studwell v. Ritch, 14 Conn. 232; lawfully be at large within this state. Prior to the passage of this law, as we have seen, the territory in which they were prohibited from running at large was an exception out of the general rule. By this statute that rule was abrogated, and the general rule of law established that animals could not lawfully be at large within the state except within such political subdivisions as the people, by an affirmative vote, had formally expressed their desire that such animals should be permitted to run at large. All other running at large of stock upon the highways or commons, or upon the land of others than the owner, without license, is made unlawful. Undoubtedly, as suggested, in proceeding under the first section of the act, it will be necessary to show that the stock was at large by the permission or through the fault of the owner. To impose the penalty therein prescribed, some guilty intention to violate the law, or willful neglect of the duty imposed, must be shown. Case v. Hall, 31 Ill. 632; Kinder v. Gillespie, 63 Ill. 88. But this does not affect the question being considered. The stock at large, with or without the knowledge or consent of the owner, is unlawfully and wrongfully at large, unless, by an affirmative vote, the county, city or village, precinct or town, has been excepted out of the general rule and policy of the state. It is thus seen that every reason assigned in former decisions for the exclusion of the common-law rule has ceased to exist. The effect of the Act of 1874 was to remove every impediment found by the court to exist in Headen v. Rust, supra, to the adopting of the common-law rule in this state. If the principle of the common law requiring the owner of cattle to keep them on his own land at his peril, which is based upon that other principle lying at the foundation of the right

If his part of a partition fence is out of repair the injured party must show that this was not the proximate cause of the trespass. Phelps v. Cousins, and Northcott v. Smith, supra.

Under N. Y. Laws 1888, p. 258, providing that if any person liable to contribute to a division fence shall neglect to make his portion, he shall not recover damages incurred, means incurred by his negligence and the owner of land damaged from stock coming across a boundary fence must show that they entered where defendant was bound to repair, in order to recover. Deyo v. Stewart, 4 Denio, 101.

Where an owner of land failed to keep up his share of the division fence under a parol agreement which took the place of statutory requirement as to both maintaining the fence, his tenant could not recover from the adjoining proprietor for damages caused by his cattle in breaking through that part of the fence which the landlord was required to maintain. Raynes v. Chastain, 68 Ind. 376.

If cattle cross a fence where it is the plaintiff's duty to keep it in repair, the defendant is not liable for damages done by such cattle, unless the fence is such as good husbandmen generally keep, since under Indiana 1 Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 496, a lawful partition fence should be such as to enclose and restrain sheep, unless by mutual consent they agree to build one to restrain horses, mules, or cattle, and under Indiana Stat., 1 Gavin & Hord, p. 343, each shall maintain equally partition fences unless otherwise specially agreed. Hinshaw v. Gilpin, 64 Ind. 116.

A person turning his cattle in his field when the division fence of an adjoining owner is insufficient, is not liable for damages under Vermont Rev. Laws, § 3184, providing that a person bound to support his part of a division fence is liable for damages to the adjoining owner for escape of stock. Eddy v. Kinney, 60 Vt. 554.

In an action of replevin for cattle held by the owner of land, it was said that the entry through a partition fence which it was the duty of the owner of the land to repair would not justify holding the cattle. Akers v. George, 61 Ill. 378.

The fact that stock was prohibited from running at large in a county will not relieve the landowner from his duty to maintain a partition fence under Iowa Code, § 1508, and § 1448, providing that where any one is injured by any domestic animal he may recover his damages, but if they were lawfully on adjoining land and escaped by negligence 22 L. R. A.

of the party injured in failing to repair his fence, he cannot recover. Duffees v. Judd, 48 Iowa, 256.

Under Ky. My. Sup. 272, regulating division fences, an adjoining owner cannot recover for damages from the cattle of the other unless the fence through which stock entered was a lawful one or was a division fence between the parties. Wills v. Walters, 5 Bush, 361.

But where a cow escaped through an insufficient division fence and a gate was left open by the defendant by reason whereof she strayed on the railroad track and was killed, both parties being alike bound to keep up the division fence, the defendant could not plead the plaintiff's failure to repair as contributory negligence. Pitner v. Shinnick, 41 Wis. 676.

The occupier of land owning cattle, and not the owner of the land, is liable for the damages caused by his cattle trespassing over a partition fence which is not divided as to having it kept up and maintained. But if the owner of the land has the custody and care of cattle belonging to another he will be liable. Tewksbury v. Bucklin, 7 N. H. 518.

An action on the case for not repairing fences, whereby another is damaged, can only be maintained against the occupier and not against the landlord who is not in possession. Cheetham v. Hampson, 4 T. R. 318.

Liability for trespass of stock of third party.

It seems that the owners of stock are only liable for the trespass of their own cattle, and are not liable for the trespass of stock owned by a third party unless such stock is held in common and controlled in common or held by another as agister; which see, under subhead—"As between owner and keeper."

A joint action for trespass from stock cannot be maintained against several owners of such stock. Cogswell v. Murphy, 46 Iowa, 44.

But where animals owned jointly by two persons trespass on the land of another the defendants are prima facie jointly liable. Sickles v. Gould, 61 How. Pr. 23.

And where cattle were "kept" upon a farm and three persons owned and "cultivated" the farm in "common" and each owned certain of the trespassing cattle, they may be sued jointly in an action for trespass committed by them in common. Jack v. Hudnall, 26 Ohio St. 255, 18 Am. Rep. 298.

The obligation of an adjacent owner for damages from stock does not apply to stock that does not belong to him passing through his farm. In such a case the owner of the stock is liable. Little v. McGuire, 43 Iowa, 447.

to possess and enjoy property in civilized society, "that each shall so use his own as not to inflict injury upon another," was in conflict with the legislation of the state, or opposed to its legislative policy prior to the Act of 1874, it cannot be said to be in conflict with, or opposed to, the policy of that law which makes the running at large of stock unlawful,—the rule and policy of the state. The principle of the common law is in harmony with existing statutes, and, as we have seen, applicable to the habits, circumstances, and conditions of the people. It is fairly to be presumed that this legislation was induced by the changed condition of the circumstances. The court had, just previous to the passage of the present law, which is sections 1 and 2 of the Act of 1872, (re-written,) while recognizing this change in the physical conditions of the state and the habits of its people, declined to recede from the doctrine of Seeley v. Peters, because of the legislative policy of the state. And finding, as we do, that the legislature, by the act, removes the impediment found in Headen v. Rust to exist to the adopting of the common-law principle, it is to be presumed that the purpose was to render the principle applicable. We are of opinion that the effect has been that, by virtue of the statute adopting the common law, this principle has become the rule of decision in this state. That this was the intention of the legislature, is, we think, further evinced by the contemporaneous legislation. At the same session of the legislature section 20, chap. 54, ("Fences,") was passed in lieu of section 15, chap. 51, of the Revised Statutes of 1845. After re-enacting, in substance, the original section, providing for the recovery of damages done by domestic animals breaking into enclosures, the fence being good and suffi-

An action lies against one party alone where his cattle trespass with cattle of others. Brady v. Ball, 14 Ind. 817.

Each owner of cattle is only liable for the damage done by his, where cattle of several parties trespass together. Partenheimer v. Van Order, 20 Barb. 478.

Damages from cattle of a third party after the original entry and trespass by cattle of another, cannot be recovered in an action against the latter, for the destruction of fences, grain, and herbage. Berry v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. 50 Cal. 435.

The owner of cattle is not liable in trespass, for damages made by cattle of others entering through the breach made by his cattle, unless under his control. Durham v. Goodwin, 54 Ill. 469.

Trespass is not the proper remedy for damages to crops by cattle of third parties where such damage occurred through failure of the defendant to put up a fence. Crawford v. Hughes, 8 J. J. Marsh. 433.

As between owner and keeper.

It seems that at common law the owner of cattle was not liable for trespass by them while the cattle were in the hands of an agister. It is believed that the cases holding contra arose from a mistake in the translation of the earliest cases. The preponderance of authority now seems to be that the owner is not liable when the stock is in the hands of the agister but that the agister is liable.

In Rosell v. Cottom, 31 Pa. 525, it is held that an owner of cattle is not liable for trespass committed by them while in charge of an agister, and it is said that neither Dawtry v. Huggins, Clayton, 33, Trials per Pais, 201, nor Bateman's Case, referred to in Dawtry v. Huggins, holds that either the owner or agister is liable.

As Dawtry v. Huggins is recognized as the leading case and is cited so frequently and has been so often incorrectly translated the following review of that case taken from Rosell v. Cottom, supra, will be of value:

"It is said in 1 Esp. N. P. 387, title, Trespass, that 'he who has the care, custody, or possession of the cattle who do the damage, is liable to this action;' and adds, 'as if agisted cattle break into another's land, the agister is liable to the damages. So if the hogs of A. were put into the yard of B. and they break into C's land, action lies against B. even 22 L. R. A.

though A's servant watches them, and so the owner had a special possession.' Dawtry v. Huggins, Clayton, 33, Trials per Pais, 201. In 2 Rolle, Abr. 546, it is laid down in one case, that if the beasts of A. agisted by B. trespass on the close of C. it is in the election of C. to bring trespass against A. or B. This is cited in Bacon's Abridgment, 498 (Bouvier, ed.), and is immediately succeeded by a reference to the case in Clayton as follows: 'But it is laid down in another case, that an action in such case lies only against the agister of the beast.' Bateman's Case, Clayton, 33. This is an error on the part of the author; Bateman's Case, is not reported in Clayton, it is referred to in the case of Dawtry v. Huggins. The principle, however, is correctly stated. But in Saunde's on Pleading & Evidence, Bateman's Case, Clayton, 33, is cited for authority, that either A. or B. the owner or agister, may be sued in trespass. This is also an error, both as to the principle and name of the case. Dawtry v. Huggins is the case reported in Clayton, 33, and is as follows: 'It was ruled upon an evidence if A. hath the custody of the goods of B. as here it was hogs put into the defendant's yard; if these do a trespass to the land of C. adjoining, A. shall be punished in trespass, and this though the owner's servant did wait upon them; and here it was proved the servant of A. did also wait on them and serve them, therefore they were in his special possession; and the like matter was relied on in the case of Stephen Bateman of Wakefield, for agist cattle, if they do commit trespass, the owner of the soil where, etc., shall answer for that trespass.' York Assizes, 1661. This case is accurately cited in 1 Esp. N. P. supra. Neither Dawtry v. Huggins nor Bateman's Case supports the doctrine that either the owner or agister of cattle may, at the election of the injured party, be sued for the trespass of agisted cattle. They are authority to the contrary. The case in Rolle, Abr. 546, refers to the Year Book, 7 Hen. IV., which does not sustain it, being but a question of pleading—whether a stranger to an award could plead it. There was no judgment in the case."

An owner of cattle is not liable in trespass for damages to crops by them while in the hands of an agister unless he selected a reckless and irresponsible agister. Ward v. Brown, 64 Ill. 307, 16 Am. Rep. 551; Osburn v. Adams, 70 Ill. 291.

And the owner of cattle is not liable to a third party for trespass by the cattle, where they are in the possession of a tenant under a lease for years. Atwater v. Lowe, 39 Hun, 150.

The owner of stock who hires his stock to pasture in the field of another is not liable for their cient, there was added: "This section shall not be construed to require such fence in order to maintain an action for injuries done by animals running at large contrary to law." And section 21 of the same chapter was also added, which provides that if any such animal shall break into an enclosure, etc., "or shall be wrongfully upon the premises of another," the owner or occupant of such premises may take and keep such animal until damages, with reasonable charges for keeping, are paid, etc. The provisions clearly contemplate that animals may be running at large contrary to law, and wrongfully upon the land of another irrespective of whether enclosed or not. In the case of Lee v. Burk, 15 Ill. App. 651, it was held, as early as 1884, that the effect of the Act of 1874 was the practical re-enactment of the common law principle and that since the passage of that act any locality where domestic animals are not permitted by a vote taken under the statute to run at large, "every man must keep his cattle from his neighbor's premises, or respond in damages for injuries committed by them." The same rule is announced in Birkat v. Williams, 80 Ill. App. 451. Neither of these cases came to this court, and the conclusion there reached would seem to have been acquiesced in by the bar and people of the state. The question is for the first time presented to this court, since the passage of the present laws relating to domestic animals; and we are of opinion that the common-law rule has, since the passage of that act, been in force in this state, and that the courts below have therefore decided correctly.

Other errors are assigned, but, in view of the holding, they become wholly unimportant, and need not be considered.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

trespasses over a division fence that the party in charge of the stock is bound to keep in repair. Osburn v. Adams, supra.

The person in control of cattle is liable for damages caused by their trespassing. Kennett v. Durgin, 59 N. H. 560.

A person having control of cattle on a leased farm is liable for damages caused by their trespasses and the fence statutes of Vermont do not relieve the owner of cattle from restraining them. Moulton v. Moore, 56 Vt. 700.

A person having the care and custody of cattle is deemed the "owner" under the Connecticut Statute, 218, providing that all damage done by cattle, horses, sheep or swine, when the fence is sufficient, shall be paid by the owners of them. Smith v. Jaques, 6 Conn. 580.

The owner in charge of cattle is liable for damages done by them on another's land, as where a cow was turned out of the pasture by a stranger and driven in the direction of plaintiff's close and being left strayed upon it. Noyes v. Colby, 80 N. H. 143.

But some decisions hold that the owner is liable for trespass by his cattle even if they are in the control of a third person. Thus in Massachusetts the owner of land who is damaged by cattle may look to either the owner of the cattle or the agister having their custody for damages—and this is not altered by Mass. Rev. Stat., chap. 113, § 4, providing for damages from trespassing cattle except from failure of injured party to keep up his part of the division fence. Sheridan v. Bean, 8 Met. 384, 41 Am. Dec. 507.

So in New Hampshire the owner of sheep is liable for damages caused by them where they strayed from his pasture in the care of his tenant. "The ancient rule that the injured party may, at his election, maintain trespass against the owner or his bailee, is not so clearly devoid of modern reason as to require a decision that it has ceased to exist." Blaisdell v. Stone, 80 N. H. 507.

And in Maine either the agister or general owner of cattle is liable in trespass for damages done by the cattle under his charge. Weymouth v. Gile, 73 Me. 448.

In Missouri also it is held that the common-law liability of an agister for damages done by cattle in his charge is not repealed by Mo. Rev. Stat., § 5553, making the owner liable for damages where cattle break through a lawful fence. Reddick v. Newburn, 76 Mo. 423. See also Hartford v. Brady, 114 Mass. 466, 19 Am. Rep. 877.

Matters in regard to "sufficiency of fence or description of fence" are not included in this note but are treated in a note to Clarendon Land Invest. & Agency Co. v. McClelland, post, —.

This note is not intended to include certain other matters somewhat similar such as the Herd law, Impounding cattle, "Holding cattle taken damage feasant," "Vicious animals," and "Diseased animals." I. T.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Rhode Island

v.

Town Council of SOUTH KINGSTOWN.

1. The jurisdiction of a court to compel town officers to call a new election for a member of the general assembly, as required by statute, is not defeated by the fact that each house is the judge of the elections and qualifications of its members, and that the ordering of a new election may involve the question of the validity of a prior election.

2. Mandamus is peculiarly the proper remedy to compel a town council to call a new election, as required by statute, where a prior election is inoperative.

3. The supreme court of Rhode Island holds it a matter of common knowl- edge that there are many Seventh Day Baptists, so called, living in Hopkinton, who observe Saturday as their Sabbath.

4. An express repeal of all acts inconsistent therewith contained in a statute amending a general law so as to create an exception for a particular town does not repeal a prior special statute, which in effect excepted another town from such general law.
5. A statute providing for a new election within ten days in a town divided into voting districts, does not violate the Rhode Island constitution, providing for a reopening of the polls in case there is no election, as this applies only to towns which are not divided into districts.
6. The requirement of a new election within ten days, in Pub. Stat., chap. 710, § 18, does not limit the power, but is intended to insure its timely exercise, and must be regarded, not as mandatory, but merely directory, where the time named has elapsed without an election.

(April 22, 1893.)

PETITION by the attorney-general for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to order a new election to choose a senator and representatives to the general assembly of the state, for the reason that an election held on the first Wednesday in April, 1893, had failed of result, and that a subsequent election ordered by the council in pursuance of the statutory requirements had also failed of result, after which the defendants had refused to order another election, as they were required to do by the statutes. Judgment for petitioner.

Heard before Matteson, Ch. J., and Stiness and Douglas, JJ.

Messrs. Arthur L. Brown and Charles E. Gorman for petitioner.

Mr. Benjamin M. Bosworth for respondents.

Per Curiam:

The court is of the opinion that it has no jurisdiction to grant the writ prayed for, since Const., art. 4, § 6, provides that "each house [of the general assembly] shall be the judge of the elections and qualifications of its members." Should the court by its writ require the town council to fix a day for a new election beyond the ten days specified in Pub. Laws R. I., chap. 710, § 18, of March 22, 1888, thereby impliedly holding that a new election so held would be legal and binding, and an election of senator and representative should then be made, the senate and house of representatives, being, under the provisions of the constitution quoted, judges of the elections and qualifications of their respective members, might nevertheless determine that such election was void, and thereby render the action of the court nugatory. The court is therefore of the opinion that it is for the general assembly to provide a remedy for the failure of the town council to call an election for senator and representative within the period limited, and not for the court. Weeden v. Richmond, 9 R. I. 128, 131. 98 Am. Dec. 373.

A rehearing was subsequently granted after which on May 3, 1893, Douglas, J., on behalf of the court, delivered the following opinion:

The question of jurisdiction lies at the threshold of this proceeding, and requires careful consideration. The constitution secures to the electors of the several towns the right to choose annually their senators and representatives in the general assembly. When the attempt to elect at the annual election meeting is unsuccessful, the constitution, where its provisions are applicable, or the statutes where it is silent, provide for adjournments of the election within certain limits. It is alleged that the statute relating to South Kingstown provides for successive elections until a result is reached. The town council refuse to call a new election, and the first ground taken in opposition to this application is that, if it is their duty to call such election, this court has no jurisdiction to ascertain and enforce that duty. This contention is based upon the fact that each house of the general assembly is the judge of the elections and qualifications of its members; and it is argued that, as the legality or illegality of the holding of the election itself may be a controlling issue in deciding upon the status of a person claiming to be elected, and so become an issue which the house in which he claims membership can alone decide, this court is precluded from any examination or decision of that question. It seems to us that this reasoning is fallacious, and involves assumptions which are subversive of the established distinctions between the several branches of the government. In the first place, it assumes that the decision of either house in the general assembly, acting under this power, has the effect of declaring the law. This is clearly not so, for the senate may seat a senator, and the house of representatives may refuse to seat a member-elect to that house, both coming with similar credentials from the same election; and the senate may specify as the ground of their action that the election was lawfully held, and the house may justify their action on the ground that the election was not lawfully held. Under the constitution, the action of each house with respect to the person claiming to be elected is valid and final; but none of the steps by which that action was reached, and none of the reasons assigned by either house, though they were spread by resolution upon its records, would have any force as declaring the law beyond the case then decided. Neither house of the legislature, by itself, can either make or authoritatively interpret the law as a rule for others. The making of the law under the constitution requires the concurrent vote of both houses; and the declaration or authoritative interpretation of the law, so as to form a precedent for subsequent cases, is for the courts. "To declare what the law is or has been is a judicial power; to declare what it shall be is legislative." Cooley, Const. Lim. 118. The late Chief Justice Ames, in Taylor v. Place, 4 R. I. 324, says (page 361): "Neither the convention which framed the constitution, nor its members, nor the members of the general assembly, nor even the general assembly itself, can authoritatively expound the constitution; but only the courts." Maxwell, J., in State v. Elder, 81 Neb. 169, 10 L. R. A. 796, says: "But it is said that the legislature is a co-ordinate branch of the government, and that it is entitled to construe the constitution and statutes for itself, and therefore is not governed by the construction placed upon it by the supreme court. That it is a very important co-ordinate branch of the government is true, and the supreme court has never, except when its action was invoked in some of the modes pointed out by law, sought to construe statutes or constitutional provisions for the legislature. It is the province of the legislature, however, to pass laws, and of the courts to construe the constitution and laws. . . . It is the duty of the court to carefully investigate every case brought before it, and, after due consideration, place what is believed to be a correct construction upon the language of any of the provisions of the constitution or of the statutes and such construction binds every department of the government, including the legislature, and every person within the state. The construction given by the supreme court becomes the standard to be applied in all cases." And again (81 Neb. 191, 10 L. R. A. 808): "The legislature is a lawful body, elected and organized in pursuance of the constitution and laws for a lawful purpose; and while, within the limits and restrictions of the constitution, it may pass any measure it may deem proper, yet morally it is bound by the same considerations of fairness and justice which control the courts, and it is its duty to dispose of election contests in this manner."

It is doubtless in the power of either house of a future legislature, in its action upon election cases, to disregard equally the statutes and the decisions of the courts; but we see no reason in the fact that this power exists why the legislature should refrain from making laws or the courts from interpreting them. Neither of the co-ordinate branches of the government can anticipate error in the other, or assume that any other will act unlawfully; particularly when the constitution has afforded to the executive and legislative departments means of ascertaining the law when it is doubted and has not been declared by previous judicial decisions. Const. R. I. art. 10, § 8. Again, it does not follow from the fact that one tribunal is the ultimate judge of a question when it arises in reference to a matter proper for its decision that another tribunal may not entertain the same question independently when called upon to decide its own action, or to compel the action of parties lawfully in its jurisdiction; and the recurrence of the same question in both fora does not exclude from the jurisdiction of either tribunal a case normally within it. Such cases are provided for and anticipated in the constitution and in the statutes. For example, the constitution provides (art. 11, § 3) as follows: "The governor and all other executive and judicial officers shall be liable to impeachment but judgment in such cases shall not extend further than to removal from office. The person convicted shall nevertheless be liable to indictment and punishment according to law." In such proceedings, whether in the assembly or in the court, questions of construction of the law of the case must arise. The senate, acting as a court to try the impeachment, may construe the law, and act in that proceeding upon such construction. The court trying the indictment may construe the same law, and its construction may determine the result of the trial. Each tribunal acts independently of the other in its own sphere, although in arriving at their several conclusions both may traverse in part the same ground. The statutes also provide (R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 288, §§ 4, 5) that for officiating as moderator, warden, or clerk, or for allowing his name to be used as a candidate for any legislative office at an illegal election a person shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, and such cases shall be tried by the supreme court. In such a case the person elected may be rejected by the house, and so the legislative body may disapprove the election; and the court, in trying the officer or candidate, may rule the election legal. Shall the court refuse to acquit a person charged with crime because one house of the general assembly has construed the law differently from its meaning as ascertained by the court? If we allow, therefore, to the senate in impeachment cases and to either house in election cases the fullest judicial power which the constitution can be supposed to give them, these powers cannot be interpreted to interfere with the independent power of the court in cases properly before it, or to bind its action as precedents; and still less can such powers in the legislature be held to limit the powers or duties of the court when its action must precede the consideration of the question elsewhere. The holding of an election which the law requires is a necessary prerequisite to bringing before the house the question of the seating of the claimant of the office. To refuse to order the election is to decide the question in advance, and preclude the house from passing upon it at all. To order the election is one step towards bringing the final question of the seating of the claimant before the ultimate tribunal which has the power to decide it. If the people who have the right to elect are not secured in it by the action of the court, they will have lost it irretrievably. The cases, People v. Hilliard, 29 Ill. 418, and State v. Elder, quoted above, are very persuasive upon this point.

Passing, then, the objection that the construction of the law may arise hereafter in another tribunal, the question is whether the case alleged is a proper one for the issue of a writ of mandamus. One office of mandamus is to enforce obedience to statute law. In general, it lies to compel all officers to perform ministerial duties, as well as to compel subordinate courts to perform judicial duties; but not to compel the exercise of discretion in any particular way. It is not contended that the duty of the town council in this matter is other than ministerial. Mandamus is peculiarly the proper remedy when other specific remedies are wanting. The remedy which a legislature can provide is to make a law applicable to the case. When the law is made, it is for the court to enforce it, or to punish for disobedience of it. In either function it must construe the statute i. e. declare what it means. In the present case, if the law already made imposes a present duty, no further legislation would make it more imperative. Any legislative act designed as a remedy must impose ministerial duties upon individuals. The court must again be resorted to, to compel such individuals to perform those duties. So that in the last analysis this remedy by mandamus is the only specific and efficient one, and if it is not afforded there are no other means which can give to the electors the opportunity to exercise such rights as the law gives them. If the law has not provided for this case, then the sole remedy is with the legislature; but, if the legislature has already expressed its will in the form of law, the sole specific remedy is in the court. It seems incumbent, therefore, upon the court to examine the statute, and see if it gives the right to the electors which is claimed,—not the right to have any particular person seated as a member of the legislature, but the right by lawful methods to express their choice of candidates for that office. It was suggested at the hearing that if the right were given by the statute in words which could not be misunderstood, mandamus would lie; but that, where the statute is not so plain as to exclude all debate as to its meaning, the court ought to refrain from construing it. We think this argument is self-destructive. The reading of any sentence in a living language requires some exercise of judgment and a choice of interpretations. It is hardly possible to write an English sentence in which words will not occur which have different meanings, and from these meanings the reader must select the one consistent with the subject and the context. If the court find a meaning in the statute, that, to them and as controlling their action, is the meaning of the statute, and the command of the law until it is repealed or amended. If the statute which is to be the rule of action of ministerial officers in important public duties presents difficulties of interpretation, it is all the more desirable that its meaning should be ascertained and more plainly declared by the court. These considerations lead us to reconsider the rescript which express the first impression of the court upon this branch of the case, and the petition will stand for argument upon the other questions involved.

Stines, J., dissenting:

I am unable to see that the court has jurisdiction of a petition like this. I do not doubt the authority of the court to issue a mandamus, which involves only a plain ministerial duty; for in such case the court exercises an executive, rather than a judicial, function. But here the controlling question is whether, if an election is called as prayed, the persons chosen at such election will be legally elected; for, unless this is so, clearly we have no right to command the calling of an election. The gist of the matter, then, is the legality of the election, and this requires the exercise of a purely judicial function, namely, the construction of chapters 710 and 923 of the Public Laws. While this duty, in ordinary cases, is one which pertains exclusively to the court, a difficulty in this case, to my mind, arises from the fact that article 4, § 6, of the Constitution says: "Each house shall be the judge of the elections and qualifications of its members." In People v. Hall, 80 N. Y. 117, Folger, J., says: "It is conceded by the text-writers that each of these houses has the sole power to judge thereof, exclusive of every other tribunal,"—citing numerous authorities; and the opinion holds that a gift of judicial power to one co-ordinate body should be construed as reserving the particular power thus bestowed from the general conferment of judicial power, by the same instrument, upon another co-ordinate body. The judicial power thus reserved is general in its terms, and embraces questions of law as well as of fact. Peabody v. Boston School Committee, 115 Mass. 383; People v. State Board of Canvassers, 129 N. Y. 860, 875, 14 L. R. A. 646.

If this court decides that a member of the legislature may be legally elected, under our construction of the law, at the meeting we are asked to order, the house to which he is so elected may decide differently, and our order for an election will be rendered futile. Of course, the court, merely on account of such difference, should not be deterred from performing a plain duty, for even the two houses of the assembly may differ between themselves as to the validity of the same election; but the possibility of such difference, with the ultimate and controlling power given to another body, seems to me to afford an appropriate test of the question of the jurisdiction of this court. The form of the proceeding is within the jurisdiction of the court; but we must look to the substance of the proceeding, rather than to the form, and the substantial thing to be decided is the legality of the election. It is urged, however, that we do not decide the legality of the election, but simply declare the meaning of the law and require a ministerial duty to be performed accordingly. This seems to me to beg the whole question. It amounts to our holding that we have jurisdiction because we take it, or to administering the law as plain because we say it is plain, when in fact we have gone outside of the terms of the law, and put a judicial construction upon it, which must of necessity declare in advance the legality of the election; while the other tribunal, to whom the constitution has exclusively confided this class of cases, may decide exactly the reverse. We are not asked to order a duty which is apparent upon an inspection of the law, but a duty which can only be arrived at by a judicial interpretation of the law. When the law says a thing shall be done in a certain way, the court may say to the inferior officer, "Do it." It is a straining of terms to say that this is an exercise of judicial functions. And this was all that was done in People v. Hilliard, 29

Ill. 418, and State v. Elder, 81 Neb. 169, 10 L. R. A. 796, cited by the petitioner, where a certificate was ordered to be given in one case, and returns to be opened in the other, in order that the disputed question might be put before the house. The cases involved no prejudgment of the controversies. But here we must prejudice the validity of the election in order to be warranted in commanding it, and this, too, when we cannot enforce that judgment, nor make it binding upon anybody but the persons to whom our command is issued.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Re Contested Election of McNeill, 111 Pa. 235, refused to entertain a writ of certiorari to review the conclusion of the court of common pleas in a contested election for senator, remarking: "Were we to assume jurisdiction to review this advisory action of the common pleas, whether we agreed or disagreed with it, our conclusion would be of no binding obligation on the house." So in Peabody v. Boston School Committee, supra, Gray, Ch. J., in speaking of a similar clause of the Constitution of Massachusetts, said: "The only form in which the justices of this court can properly express any opinion upon that subject is under that clause of the constitution which authorized each branch of the legislature, as well as the governor and council, to require it upon important questions of law and upon solemn occasions." In Mauran v. Smith, 8 R. I. 192, 5 Am. Rep. 564, this court refused to issue a mandamus to the governor of the state, and Durfee, J., said: "One reason which has been suggested for refusing the writ is that, if granted, it would tend to provoke a conflict between the judicial and executive branches of the government,—a conflict in which the judiciary would prove the weaker party. Of course, in a case where the jurisdiction is clear, such a consideration could have no weight; but where the jurisdiction is problematical, the consideration affords a presumption which it would be unwise to disregard. For, as Blackstone has remarked, 'all jurisdiction implies superiority of power. Authority to try would be vain and idle without an authority to redress; and the sentence of a court would be contemptible, unless that court had power to command the execution of it.' 1 Sharswood's Bl. Com. 242." It is no answer to this reasoning to say that the court can enforce its mandamus, when the fundamental question on which that mandamus must depend is the legality of the election. In the same line was Weeden v. Richmond, 9 R. I. 128, 98 Am. Dec. 373, where the court refused to express an opinion, under the assent of both sides, upon the ground that it had no jurisdiction to enforce it. The mandamus, of course, could have been enforced; but, the decision of the real question involved having been committed to the town council, the court would have no right to enforce it, and consequently lacked jurisdiction of the whole matter. The case, in this respect, seems to me to be identical in principle with the case at bar. The most urgent and plausible reason in favor of the jurisdiction of the court is upon the consideration of consequences. It is urged that town councils, by refusing to call a meeting through ignorance or fraud, may deprive electors of their right to elect. This may be so. But it is a significant fact that in the numerous cases with which the reports of all the states abound in regard to calling elections not one can be found where a court has interfered by mandamus to order an election for senators or representatives. This shows one of two things: either this class of cases has not been considered to be within the jurisdiction of the court, or else official fidelity to an express law has thus far been adequate to secure the rights of the people. If it be the former, the inference is almost conclusive against jurisdiction; if it be the latter, the evil consequences which have been conjectured fade away, and we may safely say that the machinery of the law, which has gone on without a break down to the quadricentennial of the landing of Columbus, does not require the aid of the court by extraordinary remedy, and it may well be trusted for the future. The safeguard of the public is to be found in the general loyalty and honesty of its own officials, and, in exceptional cases, in the penalties provided for a breach of duty. As said in People v. Fairchild, 67 N. Y. 384,—a petition for mandamus against the attorney-general: "The attorney-general may have erred in judgment, and for this there is no remedy. If he had acted corruptly, or from unworthy motives, and the legal rights of the relator have been prejudiced, this is not an appropriate remedy." And in State v. Albin, 44 Mo. 846: "There is force in the observation of the petitioner's counsel that, if the registration officers refuse to perform their duty, injustice may be done, and a party may be deprived of what he is fairly entitled to. But that would not justify a court in giving validity to a palpably illegal act, though the illegality occurred in consequence of the negligence, wilful default, or even corruption, of officers whose duty it was to perform a given function or execute a trust." In the Opinion of the Justices, 10 Gray, 618, it is said: "If it shall be asked what shall be done if one of these apportionments and returns shall be discovered to be erroneous, one answer is that the constitution has provided no power competent to inquire into and correct any such error. . . . All public officers who are charged with the performance of public duties, and who may be guilty of fraudulent, wilful and corrupt conduct in the discharge of them, are liable to prosecution and punishment therefor, by impeachment or indictment; but even punishment for their misdeeds may not necessarily correct them, though it may afford an additional security to the public against their perpetration." It may also be said that, unless the court sets the machinery in motion, the question cannot be brought before the house for decision. But even this, to my mind, does not show that the court has jurisdiction. It is not the province of the court to compel the making of a moot case for another tribunal, nor to supply, in an exigency, a remedy which the law has not provided. The law may be so framed as to enable the court to enforce its plain terms, but the court cannot take this power to itself by going outside of the constitutional limit to put a construction upon the law, and then administering it as if it needed no construction. Hence the court was correct in its original rescript that we had no jurisdiction, and that the remedy must be provided by law for the future; this instance being casus omissus.

These considerations result in the following propositions: The grant of judicial powers over elections, in the constitution, to the two houses of the assembly, is full, embracing law and fact, and is exclusive of all other jurisdiction. The process of the court may be involved in the execution of those requirements which are apparent on the face of the law, but not of such as can only be ascertained by a resort to interpretation of the law, because this is strictly a judicial power which is conferred upon the house, and thus reserved from the jurisdiction of the court. When the main question to be determined is the legality of an election, to which the issuing of process by the court is simply incidental, the court invades the jurisdiction conferred upon another body in prejudging the question; and this is made apparent by the fact that the court has no authority to enforce it in real judgment, the ultimate power being given to the other body. Jurisdiction to try and determine and power to enforce go together. Honesty of purpose and penalties for default, instead of the process of the court, are the sufficient trust of the public, as shown by the fact that the court has never been called upon to act in such a case before. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the court has no jurisdiction to pass upon the substantial question which is raised in this case.

After argument on the demurrer on May 12, 1893, Rogers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The writ of mandamus prayed for is to compel the town council of South Kingstown to order a new election of senator and representative, under the provisions of R. I. Pub. Laws, chap. 710, § 18, of March 23, 1888. That chapter was passed at the January session, 1888, and is entitled "An Act to Incorporate the District of Narragansett, in South Kingstown, R. I." As its title indicates, it is a special statute, being applicable to the single town of South Kingstown, and at the time of its passage R. I. Pub. Stat., chap. 10, § 18,* was in force, providing, inter alia, that in case of there being no election of senator and representatives in towns divided into voting districts, district meetings held therein for the election of senator and representatives shall, at the time of closing of the polls, therein prescribed by law, stand adjourned to the third day next from and after the day so appointed, unless the third day fall on Sunday or a holiday, and in that event to the Monday, or the day following said holiday, with like adjournment therefrom, but no adjournment or adjournments shall exceed seven days from the first meeting. Chapter 710, § 18, provides that, if no election shall have been made of senator and representative in the general assembly, or of either of them, in South Kingstown, upon the day appointed by law for any election, the said town council shall order a new election to be held not more than ten days from the first election, and so on until the election shall be completed. Chapter 710, § 18, then excepted South Kingstown by special statute from the operation of R. I. Pub. Stat., chap. 10, § 18, and applied a different provision of law to that town. April 30, 1890, the general assembly, by chapter 885 of the Public Laws, divided the town of Hopkinton into voting districts, and in the following March, before a single general election had been held it amended R. I. Pub. Stat., chap. 10, § 18, by R. I. Pub. Laws, chap. 923, of March 26, 1891, for the especial benefit of Hopkinton, by simply inserting therein the words: "Provided, however, that in Hopkinton there shall be no election held on Saturday, and if the third day fall on Saturday the meeting shall stand adjourned to the Monday following, being five days from and after the day so appointed." Chapter 923, § 2, was as follows: "All acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect from and after its passage." It is contended in behalf of the town council of South Kingstown that chapter 923, § 2, repealed chapter 710, § 18, because the latter is inconsistent with the former. It is a matter of common knowledge that there are many Seventh Day Baptists, so called, living in Hopkinton, who observe Saturday as their Sabbath; and, as the election for general officers and for senator and representatives falls by statute on the first Wednesday in April, a three-days adjournment therefrom would invariably fall on Saturday, a day on which the Seventh Day Baptists, from principle, perform no secular duties. Doubtless, when chapter 885 was passed, dividing Hopkinton into voting districts, the three-day provision of chapter 10 escaped attention, and was not thought of until the next general election was approaching, when chapter 923 was passed for its benefit to remedy the difficulty. Does chapter 923 repeal section 18 of chapter 710? We think not. The general rule of interpreta-

*That section in full is as follows:

"In cities other than the city of Providence, and in towns divided into voting districts, ward and district meetings held therein respectively for the election of senator and representatives, and of members of the town council, or of any one or more of them, shall, at the time of closing the polls therein prescribed by law, stand adjourned to the third day next from and after the day so appointed, unless the said third day shall fall on Sunday or on a holiday, and in that event, to the Monday, or the day following said holiday, with like adjournment therefrom, but no adjournment or adjournments shall exceed seven days from the first meeting.

Pub. Laws R. I., chap. 710, § 17, March 23, 1888, incorporating the district of Narragansett, in South Kingstown, R. I., provides: "The town council of South Kingstown shall proceed within two days next after the election to count the ballots in the same manner as is prescribed in section 14 of chapter 10 of the Public Statutes for the counting of ballots by the moderators and clerks of town and ward meetings and shall forthwith declare the result."

tion of statutes is that a general statute shall not repeal a special statute unless the purpose so to do is clearly manifest. Providence v. Union R. Co. 12 R. I. 473; Verry v. Woonsocket School Committee, Id. 578; State v. Champlin, 16 R. I. 453; Tripp v. Torrey, 17 R. I. 359. In the words of Chancellor Kent: "It is an established rule in the exposition of statutes that the intention of the language is to be deduced from a view of the whole and of every part of a statute, taken and compared together. The real intention, when accurately ascertained, will always prevail over the literal sense of terms."

The great object of the maxims of interpretation is to discover the true intention of the law." 1 Kent, Com. 461, 468. To the same purport is the language of Chief Justice Durfee in Dawley v. New Shoreham Probate Ct., 16 R. I. 696, viz.: "We like always, in construing a statute, to take the words literally, assuming that the general assembly have chosen such as readily express their intent. This cannot always be done, for it sometimes happens that words have been used that, taken literally, are inconsistent with the predominating purpose. The cases are numerous in which the literal meaning of words and phrases has been restrained or extended by construction to suit the legislative intent." In New Jersey the rule is laid down by Mr. Justice Magie in State v. Mullica Twp., 48 N. J. L. 447, 448 in this wise (omitting the names of numerous cases cited): "It has been well settled in this state that a general law on a subject-matter, which has been provided for in certain localities by special law, will not, although it contain a general repeal of acts inconsistent with it, annul or alter the special provisions in those localities [citing cases]; but if the general law expressly repeals the special laws, or shows by implication a manifest intent to supersede their provisions, the latter must yield" (citing cases). See also Gurney v. Walsham, 16 R. I. 698; Dodge v. Walsham, 16 R. I. 704; Smith v. People, 47 N. Y. 330. Is not the intention of the general assembly in the statutes referred to perfectly clear to every careful reader thereof? By chapter 710, § 18, it meant to apply a different rule to South Kingstown from the one then applicable to other towns. By chapter 923 it meant to make still another exception to chapter 10, § 18, in favor of Hopkinton, and to that end it simply amended said last-mentioned section; the very first words of chapter 923 being, "Section 18 of chapter 10 of the Public Statutes is so amended as to read as follows;" and then succeeds section 18 as amended, and in the next section is the repealing clause above referred to. What effect has the repealing clause? Clearly, it would seem that the old statute is repeated to show the context or proper position of the amendatory words as to Hopkinton, and for no other purpose. Repeating the words of chapter 10, § 18, in chapter 923, gave them no greater force than they had before, unless, indeed, to render them applicable to an exceptional case like South Kingstown; but, inasmuch as by a special statute, viz. chapter 710, South Kingstown had been taken out of the operation of chapter 10, § 18, and the manifest purpose of chapter 923 was to remedy a defect as to Hopkinton, can there be any reasonable doubt that, if the general assembly had intended to withdraw the exception as to South Kingstown, it would, in the repealing clause of chapter 923, have said, "Section 18 of chapter 710, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith, are hereby repealed?" In our opinion, the repealing clause of chapter 923 was intended to apply only to the amendatory provision of chapter 10, § 18, relating to the town of Hopkinton.

It may be urged that, unless chapter 923, § 2, operated as a repeal of chapter 710, § 18, no effect could be given to the repealing clause of said chapter 923, since the first section of that chapter acted as a repeal by substitution of said chapter 10, § 18, and fully covered the provision as to Hopkinton. The force of this argument, to our minds, is neutralized by the fact that chapter 885, to the subject-matter of which chapter 923 so manifestly relates, had been so recently enacted, and also by the fact that the two chapters are in pari materia. Applying the rule laid down in State v. Mullica, above referred to, although the general repeal clause of chapter 923 would be broad enough to include chapter 710, § 18, if intended to apply thereto, we fall in the case at bar to find a general law expressly repealing the special law, or showing by implication a manifest intent to supersede its provisions. Otherwise than as applicable to the amendatory clause relating to Hopkinton, we think the repealing clause of chapter 923 is to be regarded as merely redundant.

Having determined that section 18 of chapter 710 is not repealed by chapter 923, the next question to be considered is whether section 18 of chapter 710 is constitutional. We see no reason for deviating from the conclusion arrived at in Re Narragansett Election, 16 R. I. 761, and we are therefore of the opinion that section 18 of chapter 710 is constitutional.

Another question is whether ten days having elapsed since the last election for senator and representative in South Kingstown, a new election can take place, under chapter 710, § 18. We are of the opinion that the provision as to time in said last-mentioned section is not mandatory, but is merely directory. People v. Allen, 6 Wend. 486; In Re Census Superintendent, 5 R. I. 614. The concluding words of the judges in Re Census Superintendent, it seems to us, are equally applicable to this case. viz.: "We think that here, without doubt, the purpose was not to limit the power, but to insure its timely exercise."

Demurrer overruled.

KENTUCKY SUPREME COURT.

Alexander SMITH, by Next Friend, Appt.,
v.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. CO.

(.....Ky.....)

1. The wrongful act of a brakeman in kicking a boy off from a train in rapid motion for failure to pay his fare is within the scope of his employment, so as to render the railroad company liable for the act, where the brakeman's duties included the assistance of the conductor in collecting fares and ejecting persons who had no right to ride; but if he kicked the boy merely for the purpose of injuring him and not with the purpose of ejecting him from the train, the employer would not be liable.
2. The allegation of an answer that plaintiff voluntarily swung himself off the train, from which he alleges he was kicked, is not such an affirmative averment as requires a reply.
3. The use of the term "willful" in charging a railroad company with liability for the wrongful and negligent act of a brakeman, where the latter is not charged with committing the act willfully, does not show that the act is beyond the scope of his employment.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Franklin County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Andrew Scott and Rufus E. Dinkle for appellant.

Mr. John W. Rodman for appellee.

Hazelrigg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, a minor, suing by his next friend, alleged that while he was riding on the defendant's car from Collins' Station to the city of Frankfort, and while the car was in rapid motion, "the defendant willfully, negligently, and carelessly, by one of its agents and servants, to wit, a brakeman, kicked and threw" him off of its train, thereby breaking his arm and causing him other serious injury. The defendant denied these averments, and for a further defense alleged that the plaintiff secretly got on the rear end of one of its trains for the purpose of obtaining a free ride to Frankfort, and while so riding was discovered by its agent and servant, and thereupon voluntarily jumped off the car when in rapid motion, and whatever injury he receive was caused by his own act. The plaintiff, who was seventeen years of age, and whose home was in Frankfort, testified that he had been working at Collins' Station, some two miles west of the city, and, becoming sick, had gotten on the train for the purpose of stealing a ride home. That he was sitting on the platform, with his feet on the steps, and was discovered by the brakeman, who demanded his fare, and, upon his not having either a ticket or any money, he was told that he must get off. He replied that he would if the train would stop. The brakeman then said, "I thought I told you to get off of here," and at the same time kicked him upon the hip, which broke loose his hold on the railing, and he fell headlong on the ground, becoming unconscious. The brakeman testified that when he discovered the plaintiff, and ascertained that he had neither a ticket nor money, he told him that he must get off when the train got to the bridge, and that before he finished the sentence the plaintiff answered that he would get off now, and swung himself off in the cut, etc. He also testified, over the objection of the plaintiff, that "he had no authority from the conductor, or in any way, to put persons off the train," and that it was not his duty to do so, but that it was his duty to look after the comfort of the passengers, and to assist them in getting on and off at stations, and, in the absence of the conductor, to take up tickets and collect fares for the convenience of the conductor when he was engaged in other parts of the train; that if the plaintiff had paid him he would have handed it to the conductor, etc. The conductor testified that the brakeman had no authority to put any one off for nonpayment of fare, and he gave him no such instruction. "It is his duty," testified the conductor, "to look after the safety and comfort of passengers, to assist them on and off the train, and to assist me in ejecting an unruly passenger or one who has no right to ride, and, when I am otherwise engaged, to collect tickets and fare, and give them to me," etc. Upon this state of case the court told the jury that if they believed from the evidence "that it was a part of the duty of the brakeman, under his employment as brakeman, to eject or put off of the train persons who failed or refused to pay their fare, and they shall further believe that the brakeman kicked plaintiff off the cars while in motion, or used unnecessary force in putting him off the car, they should find for the plaintiff such damages as he sustained thereby not exceeding $10,000;" but that if they believed from the evidence "that the plaintiff jumped off the train, and was not kicked off by the defendant's employe, they should find for the defendant," and, lastly, that if they believed from the evidence "that the brakeman was not charged or required, as part of his duty under his employment as brakeman, to put persons off the train who had failed to pay their fare, they should find for the defendant." The jury found for the defendant, and did so possibly because, without regard to the question of whether the brakeman kicked the plaintiff off the train, the proof submitted to them was conclusive that the brakeman had not been instructed to put persons off the train, and that such service was no part of his duty.

NOTE.—The above very clearly and satisfactorily defines the liability of a railroad company for a tort of its brakeman in driving off a trespasser. It states the rule in a way to command assent although it seems to be somewhat stronger against the company than either Planz v. Boston & A. R. Co. 22 L. R. A.

(Mass.) 17 L. R. A. 685, or Farber v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. (Mo.) 20 L. R. A. 350, both of which are quite similar in their facts to the present case.

For a note covering the liability of masters for assaults by servants, see Davis v. Houghtalin (Neb.) 14 L. R. A. 737.

We are of opinion that the only question under the pleadings and the proof, which should have been submitted to the jury, was whether the brakeman kicked the plaintiff from the train. It was admitted that the brakeman was an employé of the defendant, and that the train was in rapid motion when the plaintiff got off or was kicked off. Whether or not what the brakeman did was in the scope of his authority or in the line of his employment was a question of law, or of mixed law and fact, to be determined by the court alone from the proof, if, indeed, that were required, and from common observation and experience, from knowledge of the nature of the business, and the daily practices which obtain in its exercise. Now, we know it to be held universally that the conductor, using no unnecessary force, may remove from the car persons who refuse to pay their fare, or are drunk, riotous, or unruly. It is an authority conceded to him,—indeed, a duty required of him,—and we would refuse to hear a railroad company's effort to plead or prove that it gave no such authority to its conductors, or did not charge them with such duties: and such, we believe, should be the rule with respect to brakemen. Even from the proof in this case, if we were to be so confined, we learn that he was to assist in the ejection of persons who had not the right to ride, and, upon the conductor's being engaged in another part of the train, he was to collect fares, and necessarily to enforce the regulations of the company to whatever extent the conductor might himself enforce them. We are so fully in accord with the view of the subject taken by the court in Hoffman v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. that we quote its language: "It is conceded that authority in a conductor to remove a trespasser in a lawful manner, whether conferred by the rules or not, is implied, and is incident to his position. We think the same concession must be made in respect to the authority of a brakeman who finds a trespasser on the platform of a car. His duties do not primarily pertain to the protection of the cars against intruders; but he is a servant of the company on the train concerned in its management, and fully cognizant of the obvious fact that intruders who jump upon the trains for a ride without intention of becoming passengers are wrongfully there. Suppose a train was standing still, and a trespasser was put off by force by a brakeman, using no unnecessary violence, would it not be a good defense to an action against him for the assault that he was brakeman, and did the act complained of in that capacity, although without express authority? The implied authority in such a case is an inference from the nature of the business, and its actual daily exercise, according to common observation and experience. But, assuming authority in the conductor or brakeman to remove a trespasser in a lawful manner, the question remains whether, when a conductor or brakeman, without warning or notice of any kind, kicks a boy of eight years from the platform of a car while the train is running at a speed of ten miles an hour, he can be said to be acting within the scope of his employment, so as to make the company liable for the act. Assuming the case made by the plaintiff the act was flagrant, reckless, and illegal. But the point is, Was the act within the scope of the employment and authority? . . . In this case the authority to remove the plaintiff from the car was vested in the defendant's servants. The wrong consisted in the time and mode of exercising it." And the company was held responsible. 87 N. Y. 25, 41 Am. Rep. 387. In this case the brakeman sought to collect the fare from the defendant, not for himself, but for the company. Upon his failure to pay, he sought to eject him from the car, not to accomplish his own ends, but to subserve the interests of the company. The company, it is true, owed the plaintiff no duty arising out of a contract to carry him or to protect him; nevertheless it might not violate the common instincts of humanity, or treat the plaintiff brutally, in its process of ejecting him from the car. Undoubtedly, where the object of the servant—the end sought to be reached by him—is the intentional or malicious infliction of an injury upon the person of the trespasser, the company is not liable for his act, and the existence of malice or intentional and willful design is a question of fact to be ascertained from all the circumstances of the case. If the end sought by the employé was the infliction of an injury,—if the purpose he had in view, when he kicked the plaintiff off the train, if he did kick him off, was to injure him,—then the company is not liable, because the act would be malicious and willful. But if the end sought was the ejection of the intruder,—if his purpose was devoid of evil design and merely to protect the interest of his employer,—then, however careless or reckless the means employed, the company is liable. The case cited by counsel for the appellee, and said to be directly in point, illustrates the distinction. The plaintiff, a boy and a trespasser, was driven off the train by a brakeman, who threw coal at him so as to cut and blind him, and cause him to slip and fall on the track, whereby he was injured. The company was held not to be liable. Towanda Coal Co. v. Heeman, 86 Pa. 418. So, this court, in the case of Winnegar v. Central Pass. R. Co., 85 Ky. 547, said: "If one driving the cars for the corporation should leave the car and beat or abuse one on the sidewalk, the company would not be responsible." The principle involved and stated by this court in Sherley v. Billings, 8 Bush, 147, 8 Am. Rep. 451, in this language, that "if the servant goes beyond the scope of his employment he is as much a stranger to his master as to any third person, and his acts can in no sense be regarded as the acts of his master," is easy of announcement, but sometimes difficult of application. In all cases where unnecessary force is used it may be said that the servant acted without authority, express or implied. It can truthfully be claimed in all cases, and by all companies, that the authority of their servants is limited to the exercise only of force sufficient to eject a trespasser or passenger in a lawful manner. Nevertheless, the company is liable if the servant in the exercise of his authority, within the general scope of his employment and in the line of his duty, use unnecessary force, or use it under circumstances or at a time when the consequences ordinarily would be seriously injurious to the person ejected. In this case it does not matter that the act of ejection is charged in the petition as having been done willfully as well as negligently and carelessly. The willfulness is charged against the defendant company, and for this reason it cannot be said that the use of the term "willful" in itself shows the act to have been malicious on the servant's part, and therefore beyond the scope of his authority. The servant is not charged with committing the act willfully, but the company is charged to have willfully done it by its agent and servant.

The allegation of the answer that the plaintiff voluntarily swung himself off the train is not such an affirmative averment as required a reply. The simple issue was presented whether or not the brakeman kicked him off. The statement that he swung himself off is merely in emphasis of the denial that he was kicked off. It is mere surplusage, and at any rate is in indirect conflict with the averment of the petition that the plaintiff was kicked off, and is in substance a denial of that averment. We are of opinion that the only issues to be submitted to the jury in this case are whether or not the brakeman kicked the plaintiff off of the car, as testified to by the plaintiff, and whether he did so with or without malice or evil design, as indicated above; and upon the determination of these issues depends the question of the company's responsibility for the plaintiff's injury.

Judgment reversed, with directions to proceed as indicated by this opinion.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Charles B. OLMSTEAD, Appt.,

v.

Henry BACH & SON.

1. A contract to hire a person for a year for a certain sum per week, payable weekly, is entire and indivisible.
2. One dismissed from service in breach of a contract to employ him for one year at a certain sum per week, payable weekly, can maintain but one action for the breach, and will not be permitted to maintain a separate action for each weekly installment as it falls due.
3. An employe wrongfully dismissed from service in breach of the contract of hiring cannot maintain an action for unearned wages as such, although he holds himself in readiness to perform his part of the contract, but his action must be for breach of the contract.
4. A satisfied judgment in an action by a discharged employe working under a contract for a year at a certain sum per week payable weekly, against the employer, based on the contract, is a bar to a subsequent action thereon, although the recovery was for only one week's salary.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract of employment. Affirmed.

NOTE.—The above case which as first reported in 18 L. R. A. 53, seemed somewhat inconsistent with that of Keedy v. Long (Md.) 5 L. R. A. 759, is now reversed on rehearing.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Marshall and William L. Hodge for appellant.

Messrs. Thomas M. Lanahan and Frank Gosnell, for appellees:

The contract under consideration is an "entire contract," and in the dismissal of the appellant by the appellees there was but one breach, and, therefore, there can be but one cause of action, and the recovery before the magistrate, and the satisfaction of that judgment, is a bar to the present action.

Dugan v. Anderson, 86 Md. 535, 11 Am. Rep. 509; McCullough Iron Co. v. Carpenter, 67 Md. 554; Keedy v. Long, 5 L. R. A. 759, 71 Md. 385; Keedy v. Crane, 71 Md. 395; Clossman v. Lascote, 28 Eng. L. & Eq. 140; Jamas v. Allen County, 44 Ohio St. 226, 58 Am. Rep. 831; Booge v. Pacific Railroad, 33 Mo. 212, 82 Am. Dec. 169.

In Keedy v. Long, and Keedy v. Crane, supra, the doctrine of "constructive service" for the first time was urged upon this court, and counsel for Miss Long and Miss Crane relied upon the cases of Armfield v. Nash, 31 Miss. 361; Colburn v. Woodworth, 31 Barb. 381; Thompson v. Wood, 1 Hilt. 97, and Fowler v. Armour, 24 Ala. 199, in support thereof, but this court considered the doctrine utterly indefensible and untenable Judge McSherry delivering the opinion, that "it was formerly determined in England, and followed in some cases in this country, that in such a case the servant holding himself in readiness to perform his contract, and being able and willing to do so, was entitled to recover his wages for the whole term, upon the ground of constructive service. This doctrine had its origin in a decision by Lord Ellenborough at nisi prius, in Gandell v. Pontigny, 4 Campb. 375, 1 Stark. 198. It was followed in other cases, then doubted, again adopted, but finally repudiated altogether in Elderton v. Emmens, 6 C. B. 160; Goodman v. Pocock, 15 Q. B. 576.

*A decision was reached in this case and an opinion handed down by Judge Page on November 18, 1892, in which the judgment of the lower court was reversed. 18 L. R. A. 53. A petition for a rehearing was subsequently filed which resulted in the opinion given herewith.

The cases in New York have been expressly overruled by the court of appeals of that state in Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 373, 19 Am. Rep. 285; and the remaining cases in Mississippi and Alabama were repudiated and disapproved by that court in that case, and by the supreme court of Ohio in James v. Allen County, supra; and by the court of appeals of Illinois in Jones v. Duntun, 7 Ill. App. 580.

McSherry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The declaration in this case alleges that the plaintiff and defendants entered into a written contract under seal, whereby the latter agreed to pay to the former a salary of $50 per week, payable weekly, as compensation for the services of the plaintiff as cutter in the business of the defendants, and that the plaintiff agreed, in consideration of said salary, to devote his time and attention to the business of the defendants, as is usual in conducting a merchant tailoring business. The agreement further provided that the contract should continue in full force for one year from February 1, 1892, to February 1, 1893. The declaration also avers that the plaintiff entered into the service of the defendants under the above contract, and performed his duty thereunder until April 5, 1892, when the defendants refused to permit him to perform his part of said contract, or to pay him the salary to which he was entitled thereunder, after April 9, 1892. It further alleges that the plaintiff has always been ready and willing to perform his part of the contract, and to render the services which he agreed thereby to perform, and has always held himself in readiness and offered to perform said services according to said contract, but that the defendants have refused to permit him to perform the contract on his part, and have refused, and still do refuse, to pay him the salary of $50 a week, as therein provided, since April 9, 1892. It concludes with a claim by the plaintiff "that there is due and unpaid to him of the amount payable to him under said contract the sum of $250, being the amount of said weekly salary stipulated to be paid by said contract to the 25th of May, 1892."

Among the defenses relied on the defendants pleaded that on April 5, 1892, they dismissed the plaintiff from their service, and at the same time paid him all wages or salary due to him under the contract down to April 9, the end of the week terminating four days after his dismissal; that nine days after said dismissal the plaintiff brought suit against the defendants before a justice of the peace upon the identical contract and cause of action sued on in the case at bar, and that thereafter the plaintiff recovered judgment in that suit for the sum of $50 and costs, which judgment was fully paid and satisfied by the defendants before the pending action was brought. To this plea the plaintiff replied that after the pretended dismissal of him by the defendants he, notwithstanding the dismissal, presented and offered himself to the defendants as ready and willing to perform his part of the contract set forth in the declaration, and did in fact continuously so offer to perform the same, and that the suit mentioned in said plea was a suit for his salary for one week under said contract. This replication was demurred to. The Baltimore city court sustained the demurrer, and entered judgment thereon for the defendants. The plaintiff thereupon took this appeal from that judgment.

It is apparent from this outline of the pleadings that the wages or salary now sought to be recovered, as well as those sued for before the magistrate, were not wages or salary which had been actually earned, but were wages or salary for work and labor that the plaintiff was ready and willing, but had not been allowed, to perform. That the contract declared on was broken by the defendants when they dismissed the plaintiff is conceded, or, at least, is not denied, by the pleadings. For that breach the plaintiff was clearly entitled to recover. But to what extent, and how often? The answer to these inquiries involves at the very outset an examination of the scope of the agreement set forth in the declaration, as to whether it is an entire or divisible one; because, if it be entire and indivisible, and there has been but a single breach, but one action can be brought therefor. The contract is one of hiring. Under it the plaintiff was employed as a cutter at $50 per week, payable weekly, and it was expressly provided that this employment and this weekly payment of wages should continue for one year. The duration of the employment was as much an integral part of the agreement as the stipulation relating to the amount of the compensation and the stated periods for its payment. It was not a hiring by the week, payable weekly, because it was explicitly declared that it should continue for a year. It was not fifty-two separate, independent contracts, but one indivisible agreement, covering the period of a year, and making provision for the weekly payment of wages. The consideration for the plaintiff's undertaking was the defendants' agreement to pay him $50 a week and to employ him as a cutter for one year. The latter was as much a part of the consideration promised him for entering the service of the defendants as the former, for it would be wholly unreasonable to assume, as any other construction must, that it was the intention of the parties that the hiring should be for a week, determinable by notice, or else merely a hiring at will, as it undoubtedly would have been had there been no stipulation as to its duration. McCullough Iron Co. v. Carpenter, 67 Md. 554. The good sense and reasonableness of the particular case must always guide and govern courts in determining whether a contract is divisible or entire. Dugan v. Anderson, 36 Md. 585, 11 Am. Rep.

500; Jones v. Dunn, 8 Watts & S. 109; Robinson v. Green, 3 Met. 159. Whether a contract must be sued on as an entirety or is divisible and can become the foundation of separate suits for the infraction of independent stipulations depends on its terms; and, in order to arrive at a correct construction, due regard must be had to the intention of the contracting parties as revealed by the language which they have employed, and the subject-matter to which it has reference. Broumel v. Rayner, 68 Md. 47; Brewster v. Frazier, 82 Md. 808; Brantly, Cont. 216. Obviously the appellant expected and contracted for continuous employment for a year, and not for a weekly or still more precarious hiring at will, and the appellees contemplated securing a permanent cutter in their tailoring business. Certainty in the duration of the employment, as well as exemption from the annoyance incident to frequent changes in such an employ, were manifestly within the contemplation of both of the parties to the contract when it was entered into, and with these considerations before them it seems to us clear that the appellant never supposed himself only hired by the week or at will, and equally clear that the appellees never understood that their employé was at liberty to terminate the engagement upon a week's notice. The hiring was for a year and the wages were payable in weekly installments of $50 each. The subsidiary provision as to the payment of the wages each week does not split up the contract into as many agreements as there were payments or periods named for payments to be made (Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 29 L. ed. 366); nor is it inconsistent with a yearly hiring (Norton v. Conwell, 65 Md. 362; Fawcett v. Cash, 5 Barn. & Ad. 908); for, as said by Lord Kenyon in King v. Birdbrooke, 4 T. R. 245: "Whether the wages be to be paid by the week or the year can make no alteration in the duration of the service if the contract were for a year." The contract is, then, an entire, and not a divisible, one. It does not consist of distinct and independent subjects which admit of being separately executed and closed. A dismissal during the year was consequently a breach of the contract as an entirety, and furnished the party not in default with a good cause of action. The contract being entire, and having created the relation of master and servant, and the latter having been, as averred in the pleadings, dismissed before the expiration of the term for which he had been engaged, what redress was open to him? Obviously but one remedy for the recovery of the whole damage sustained by him. In Keedy v. Long, 71 Md. 389, 5 L. R. A. 759, this court said: "A servant wrongfully discharged has only two remedies open to him at law, either of which he may pursue immediately on his discharge. First, he may treat the contract as continuing, and bring a special action against the master for breaking it by discharging him, and this remedy he may pursue whether his wages are paid up to the time of his discharge or not; or, secondly, if his wages are not paid up to the time of his discharge, he may treat the contract of hiring as rescinded, and sue his master on a quantum meruit for the services he has actually rendered. These two alternative remedies are the only ones open to him. Mayne, Damages, 159. Upon a quantum meruit he can only recover for the services actually rendered. Archard v. Hornor, 3 Car. & P. 349; Smith v. Haywood, 7 Ad. & El. 544. In an action for damages for a breach of the contract he will be entitled to recover the actual damages he has sustained, in addition to the wages earned; and in case he has by diligence been unable to secure other employment during the entire term, he can recover the entire wages, less the amount he has actually earned during the interim, or the amount he might have earned by the exercise of proper diligence in seeking for employment in the same or similar business. Wood, Mast. & S. 249; Mayne, Damages, 158; Elderton v. Emmens, 6 C. B. 160; Goodman v. Pocock, 15 Q. B. 576." Jafray v. King, 84 Md. 217. In the case at bar the pleadings show that all wages earned by the appellant had been paid to him in full up to the end of the week during which he was dismissed. When he brought suit before the justice of the peace he had earned no wages which had not been paid him, for he had rendered no services after his dismissal. He was, therefore, at that time in no position to sue upon a quantum meruit for the value of services actually performed, and he could only recover in that suit damages for a breach of the entire contract, unless the contract was divisible into fifty-two independent agreements, each capable of being separately executed and closed. His wages having been paid in full up to the time of his dismissal, he had no option as to remedies which he might pursue. He was confined to an action for the recovery of damages which he had sustained by a breach of the contract, because successive actions, instituted for the recovery of fractions of the same aggregate damages, cannot be supported. His suit before the magistrate was, whatever it purported to be, a suit for the breach of the contract of hiring. It could have been for nothing else, except for services never rendered, the value of which was measured by the price agreed to be paid for them when actually performed. There was but one dismissal and but one breach, and the plaintiff could not split up his cause of action, recovering a part of his damages in one suit and the remainder afterwards in other suits for that single breach. It is an ancient and familiar rule of law that only one action can be maintained for the breach of an entire contract, and the judgment obtained by the plaintiff in one suit may be pleaded in bar of any second proceeding. Sedgw. Damages, 224; Dugan v. Anderson, 36 Md. 584, 11 Am. Rep. 509. It was the appellant's plain duty to include all that belonged to that cause of action—that one breach—in the first suit, so that one proceeding and one recovery should settle the rights of the parties. It would be at his own risk and peril if he negligently or ignorantly omitted a part of what might properly have been embraced in the cause of action in the first suit. Or, as expressed by Lord Campbell in Clovesman v. Lacoste, 28 Eng. L. & Eq. 140, "if the contract is entirely broken, and the relation of employer and employed put an end to, I agree that the party suing ought to allege in his declaration the whole gravamen that he suffers by such breach of contract, and that he may recover therein all the damages that may ensue to him in consequence." Again, as clearly put by the supreme court of Ohio in James v. Allen County, 44 Ohio St. 226, 58 Am. Rep. 821: "As a result of the authorities, as well as upon principle, we are satisfied that in such a contract as the one in the case at bar, where the employé is wrongfully dismissed, but all wages actually earned up to that time are paid, the only action the employé has, whether he brings it at once or waits until the entire period of time has expired, is an action for damages for the breach of contract; and the measure of damages will be the loss or injury occasioned by that breach, and one recovery upon such claim, whether the damages be denominated 'loss of wages' or 'damages for breach,' is a bar to a future recovery." Wood, Mast. & S. 246.

It is to be observed that the case at bar is distinguishable from a class of cases alluded to in Clovesman v. Lacoste, supra, where, there having been no dismissal of the servant, the only breach of the contract consisted in the failure of the master to pay, when due, the wages or installments of wages actually earned. In those instances, the contract not having been broken by the dismissal of the servant, and he not having been prevented from performing his work, and the relation of master and servant still continuing, an action on the contract could be maintained to recover the salary or wages due for a past stated period. Keedy v. Long, 71 Md. 393, 5 L. R. A. 759. But a dismissal of the servant, or, differently stating the same thing, a refusal to allow him to continue to work, while not a rescission of the contract, is a breach of it that will authorize a recovery of damages for the whole injury which the servant may have sustained. And such a suit may be instituted though the time for the completion of the service has not elapsed. Keedy v. Long, supra. This conclusion does not involve an application or adoption of the principle laid down in Hochster v. De La Tour, 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 167.

The law of the case just cited relates to cases where there is a precontract for future services, or the performance of some act or duty at a future period, and where performance cannot be commenced, and was not by the contract contemplated, until that period arrives, and where the promisor, prior to that time, announces his intention not to abide by the contract. But that is not this case, where performance had been commenced, and the plaintiff was prevented by the defendants from further executing it.

But it is insisted the pending suit is not for damages for dismissing the plaintiff, but that it is an action on the contract to recover the plaintiff's salary for the five weeks following the one for which a recovery had been had before the justice of the peace. And the right to recover this salary as salary, and not as damages for a breach of the contract, is based upon the plaintiff's readiness and willingness to perform his work, and not upon his actual performance of it; in other words, he seeks to recover installments of salary for work which he never performed, and to recover them merely because he was willing to perform it, but was prevented from doing so. As thus presented, under a contract that is indivisible, and which covers a hiring for a whole year at a salary payable in weekly installments, it is a claim to recover for constructive services. Had the action been indebitatus assumpsit, it is conceded the doctrine of constructive service would be involved, but, as the suit is on an express contract prescribing the amount of each installment of the compensation, it is urged that the defendants are liable for the stipulated price of the services the plaintiff agreed to perform, but never did perform, and that they are liable, because the plaintiff was not permitted to perform them, though ready and willing to do so. In both indebitatus assumpsit and in an action on an express contract to recover wages for services which have not been performed, a recovery is sought for the amount that the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover had the services in fact been rendered; and such recovery is sought, not because the services have been rendered, but because the plaintiff was ready and willing to render them, and the defendant prevented him. In both instances, therefore, the readiness of the plaintiff to perform and the refusal of the defendant to allow a performance, constitute, when unearned wages are sued for, the ground of the actions, though the forms and the allegations of the pleadings are widely different. That which is sought to be recovered in both cases is the same thing, viz. wages as wages, though in the one case it is under the allegation of work and labor done, which allegation is attempted to be supported by the proof of a readiness and willingness to perform; and in the other it is under an allegation of a refusal to allow that work to be done which the plaintiff had agreed to do, and continued ready and willing to do. Salary as salary, definitely fixed and agreed to, and not a sum of money as unliquidated damages for a broken contract of hiring, is what is sued for under the declaration in the case at bar. It is a suit to recover wages, though no services have been rendered at all, and, if maintainable in that form, would preclude the defendants from showing by evidence that the plaintiff could have secured other similar employment during the time covered by the contract; because, if wages, distinctively as wages, can be recovered under such conditions, instead of damages for a wrongful discharge or dismissal, they must be recovered as specific, ascertained debts, the amount of which is fixed by the contract, and is in no way subject to abatement by circumstances which would reduce the damages in a suit founded on a refusal by the defendant to allow the plaintiff to perform his part of an indivisible contract of hiring. In other words, if under such a contract the plaintiff is entitled to recover wages as wages upon a mere offer to perform, he must be entitled to recover just precisely the wages named in the contract, even though he might have obtained other work of the same kind, at the same price, during the period for which he claims his wages under the contract. This would be recovering for constructive services. That doctrine has been altogether repudiated, both in England and in this country. Keedy v. Long, 71 Md. 389, 5 L. R. A. 759. "The doctrine of constructive service has, in England, where it had its origin, been repudiated, and the law there established that a servant wrongfully discharged has not an action for wages, unless something is due for past services actually rendered; and as to any other claim on the contract it is for the breach of it, and for his damages resulting therefrom, being the ordinary action for damages, and not the common-law action of indebitatus assumpsit." James v. Allen County, supra; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362,—where Gandell v. Pontigny, 4 Campb. 375; Thompson v. Wood, 1 Hilt. 96, and the cases in Alabama, Mississippi, and Wisconsin are distinctly disaffirmed, and the doctrine of constructive service declared to be "so opposed to principle, so clearly hostile to the great mass of authorities, . . . that" it could not be accepted. We hold, then, that the contract declared on is entire and indivisible; that for the breach of it by the defendants in discharging the plaintiff before the expiration of the year, or in refusing to allow him to work, a right of action arose, not for unearned wages or salary, as such, but for damages for a breach of the contract, the measure of which damages would be the stipulated salary for the stipulated period of one year, less the amount the plaintiff actually earned, or might, by due and reasonable diligence, have earned, after his dismissal (Jaffray v. King, 34 Md. 223); that, as there was but one breach, but one action could be maintained therefor; that, having recovered before the magistrate in a suit founded on that breach,—for he could have lawfully recovered upon no other theory,—he is barred, upon the satisfaction of that judgment, from again suing on the same contract, because he could have recovered in one action all the damages he sustained, including that for which he now sues; and that, if the pending action be treated as a suit to recover for installments of salary under the contract, no services having been rendered by him, it must fail, because the services were never rendered, but were constructive. The plaintiff elected to sue before a justice of the peace for a portion of the amount he might have recovered had he claimed more and sued in a different forum, and he must abide the result of that election. He is not at liberty to split up his cause of action into fragments, and successively sue for each, when there has been but one breach of an entire and indivisible contract. As we agree with the court below, its judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed with costs in both courts.

31st day of August, 1888, by one R. J. Chambers, on certain mules to secure a debt due by Chambers to appellee. This mortgage was duly recorded in the proper office. Subsequently, and while the mortgage remained unpaid but after it had become due, Chambers put the mules in the livery stable of John H. Clisby to be kept and fed. For this service Chambers became indebted to Clisby in the sum of $200, for the satisfaction of which Clisby claimed a lien on the mules. The mortgagor and Clisby entered into an agreement that the mules should be sold by defendant and the proceeds held by him for the benefit of whichever party should be entitled to them. After the sale, the bank brought this action to recover the proceeds.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. A. A. Wiley, for appellant:

Animals must be preserved and their preservation really inures to the benefit of the mortgagee; the lien is a statutory creation and a mortgage, executed while the statute is of force, is taken in subordination thereof, and is subject to such statute as a general rule of law. The mortgagee takes his mortgage with full knowledge of, and subject to, the statutory lien of the liveryman as he would to a common-law lien.

In Johnson v. Hill, 3 Stark. 172, it appeared that one who had obtained wrongful possession of a horse, took it to a livery-stable keeper, and left it; and it was held that a lien existed in favor of the latter against the owner.

In Williams v. Allsup, 10 C. B. N. S. 416, a shipwright, who had done repairs on a vessel at the instance of the mortgagor, was given a lien paramount to that of the prior mortgage; and the same conclusion was reached in the case of Scott v. Delahunt, 5 Lans. 372.

Smith v. Stevens, supra; Laird v. Moonan, 32 Minn. 358.

The statute (section 3089 of the Code) gave Chambers as mortgagor or bailor the right to put a lien on the mules in question in order to preserve them.

Colquitt v. Kirkman, 47 Ga. 558.

Messrs. Tompkins & Troy, for appellee: The law gives to the livery-stable keeper a lien on stock kept and fed by him, but it nowhere provides that it shall be superior to the liens created before his, of which he had notice, actual or constructive.

Code 1886, §§ 3089-3090; Bissell v. Pearce, 28 N. Y. 252; Jones, Liens, § 691.

To give it such construction would make the act unconstitutional. The legislature would have no authority to pass a law authorizing the divestiture of a title without the consent of the party whose title was divested; or without giving him a day in court.

Wimberly v. Mayberry, 14 L. R. A. 805, 94 Ala. 240.

Haralson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question presented by this record is, Has the statutory lien of a livery-stable keeper, given by section 3089 of the Code, for the keeping and feeding of stock, precedence over a mortgage on the animals previously given by their owner, the law day of the mortgage having passed and the animals remaining in the possession of the mortgagor? That section reads: "Any keeper, owner, or proprietor of a livery stable shall have a lien on all stock kept and fed by him, for the payment of his charges for keeping and feeding such stock, and he shall have the right to retain the stock, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of such charges." This question is an undecided one in this state, and there is a conflict in the authorities on it. Mr. Jones, in his work on Liens, with these conflicting authorities before him, says: "A chattel mortgage upon a horse is superior to a subsequent lien of a livery-stable keeper, where the horse is placed in the stable by the mortgagor after the making of the mortgage, without the knowledge of the mortgagee," and, as reasons leading to this conclusion, he adds: "It is not to be supposed that a statute giving a lien for the keeping of animals was intended to violate fundamental rights of property, by enabling the possessor to create a lien without the consent of the mortgagee, when the person in possession could confer no rights, as against the mortgagee, by a sale of the animals. The keeper of animals intrusted to him by the mortgagor undoubtedly acquires a lien against the mortgagor, but it is a lien only upon such interest in them as the mortgagor had at the time, and not a lien as against the mortgagee, between whom and the keeper of the animals there is no privity of contract. The mortgagor, though in possession, is in no sense the mortgagee's agent nor does he sustain to the mortgagee any relations which authorize him to contract any liability on his behalf. The statute cannot be construed to authorize the mortgagor to subject the mortgagee's interest to a lien, without his knowledge or consent, as security for a liability of the mortgagor, unless such a construction clearly appears, from the language of the statute, to be unavoidable." In support of these views he cites Jackson v. Kasseall, 30 Hun, 281; Bissell v. Pearce, 28 N. Y. 252; Charles v. Neigelsen, 15 Ill. App. 17; Sargent v. Usher, 55 N. H. 287, 20 Am. Rep. 208; State Bank v. Love, 22 Neb. 68; Easter v. Goyne, 51 Ark. 222; McCreary v. Gaines, 55 Tex. 485, 40 Am. Rep. 818; Small v. Robinson, 69 Me. 425, 81 Am. Rep. 299; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 474.

The contrary construction, sustained by respectable authority, proceeds upon the idea that the animals must be preserved, and that their preservation inures to the benefit of the mortgagee; that the lien is of statutory creation, purely, and a mortgage executed while the statute is of force is taken in subordination thereof, and is subject to such statute, as a general rule of law; that a mortgagee, when he takes a mortgage, takes it, in legal contemplation, with full knowledge of, and subject to, the rights of a person who may keep the property at the request of the mortgagor or other lawful possessor, under the statutory lien, as he would do, to a common-law lien. Hammond v. Danielson, 128 Mass. 294; Colquitt v. Kirkman, 47 Ga. 555; Smith v. Stevens, 36 Minn. 308; Case v. Allen, 21 Kan. 217-220, 80 Am. Rep. 425; Williams v. Allsup, 10 C. B. N. S. 417; The Granite State, 1 Sprague, 277.

It is for us to determine which of these conflicting views is more consonant with reason, and the policy of our own statutes. Thus aided, we may the more readily arrive at the intention of the legislature in the creation of this statutory lien. Our registration laws proceed upon the idea that no one with notice of a mortgage on personal property has the right to deal with it, in any wise, to the prejudice of the mortgagee, and that, with knowledge or notice of the existence of the mortgage, he can acquire no rights in or title to the property mortgaged which are not in subordination to those of the mortgagor; and we can perceive no reason, in the absence of a provision of the statute to that effect, to exempt a livery-stable keeper, more than any other person, from the force and effect of our registration laws. It is not for us to give these statutes any such construction unless we are constrained to do so by the manifest intention of the legislature. These laws are of universal and unvarying application to all persons and classes not specially exempted by statute. Code, § 1814. Accordingly, we have held that the due registration of a mortgage on personal property is constructive notice to those who deal with the property, as binding on them as actual notice would be (Hudmon v. Du Bose, 85 Ala. 446, 2 L. R. A. 475; Heflin v. Slay, 78 Ala. 180; Mayer v. Taylor, 69 Ala. 403), and that a factor or commission merchant, for instance, receiving and selling cotton for a mortgagor, without actual notice of the mortgage, is liable in trover to the mortgagee, if the mortgage has been properly recorded in the county in which the cotton was raised (Marks v. Robinson, 82 Ala. 70; Hudmon v. Du Bose, supra).

It will hardly be contended that if the mortgagor, when he took the animals mortgaged to the livery-stable keeper, had notified him that the plaintiff held a mortgage on them to secure a debt which he owed it, the stable keeper would have been justified and protected, under our statute and decisions, in taking them into his charge and keeping, to the prejudice of the plaintiff, and yet the registration of plaintiff's mortgage was as effective as actual knowledge of plaintiff's rights and interests in the premises. The legislature, in the creation of this lien, did it, we must presume, with reference to our registration statutes, and the general policy of our law for the protection of mortgagees of personal property. In the adoption of the statute, it gave no preference or priority of lien over prior mortgages or incumbrances. The court below did not err in giving the general charge for the plaintiff, and in refusing a like charge for defendant.

to that effect, subjecting himself to such damages as will compensate the other party for being stopped in the performance of his part at that stage in the execution of the compact. The party thus forbidden to proceed cannot afterwards go on, complete the contract, and recover the contract price, as such; his only remedy being for damages for breach of contract.

ON REMARKING.

1. The contract referred to in the original opinion construed, and held, to create

NOTE.—Is a subscription contract joint or several?

In case of an ordinary subscription contract, where the undertaking is to pay the amount set opposite the respective signatures of the parties for some benevolent or other enterprise the general practice has been to regard the contract of each subscriber as separate from that of others, so as to sustain an action against each subscriber individually. Most of the cases upon the subject have been brought and decided, however, with no attempt to raise the question of whether or not they were properly brought,—at least so far as the reports of the cases themselves are concerned. The following are examples of that class of cases, and although it is not meant to be exhaustive, sufficient of them have been collected to show the universality of the practice: Randolph County Comrs. v. Jones, 1 Ill. 108; McClure v. Wilson, 43 Ill. 356; Trustees of M. E. Church v. Garvey, 53 Ill. 401; Snell v. Trustees of M. E. Church, 58 Ill. 290; *Beach v. First M. E. And it is immaterial that there are two contracting parties, a promisee as well as a promisor. Williams v. Rogan, 59 Tex. 438.

The language of most of the contracts is such that no question as to their being several or joint could arise. For instance, in a contract of subscription to maintain a minister the language was, "We, whose names are here underwritten, promise, covenant, and pledge each one for himself individually and severally that we will pay or cause to be paid such sums as are respectively annexed to our names," and a separate action against a single subscriber was maintained. First Religious Soc. in Whitestown v. Stone, 7 Johns. 118.

The same result has followed in most instances where a question has been raised as to the proper form of the action. With few exceptions the action against the individual has been held proper.

The subscription paper should be regarded as the separate promise of each subscriber to pay the money set opposite his name when the contract is complied with, which becomes a binding individual contract when it is accepted and the contract complied with. Wayne & Ontario Collegiate Inst. v. Smith, 36 Barb. 574.

a several liability on the part of each subscriber to the amount of his subscription only.

2. Held, further, that in other respects the interests of the subscribers were joint, and that all must unite in order to repudiate and renounce the contract.

3. Held, also, that the trial court erred in not submitting to the jury the question as to fraudulent representation and concealment made in order to obtain the defendant's signature to the instrument.

(February 23, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Stearns County refusing to grant a new trial after judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover upon an alleged contract subscribing money for the erection of a certain building. Reversed.

The contract in this case was composed of three printed sheets, marked respectively a, b, c, with the necessary blanks for descriptions, amounts, and signatures. Each paper contained an undertaking on the part of Davis & Rankin, the parties of the first part, to erect a certain building, which differed from the building described in each of the other contracts, and as appears from a clause in the contract, subsequently set out the particular specifications which should become binding, would depend on the amount subscribed. The material portion of the contract was as follows:

"We Davis & Rankin, party of the first part, with the undersigned subscribers hereto, party of the second part, agree to build, erect, complete, and equip for said party of the second part a combined butter and cheese factory" at or near a certain place, with certain dimensions and equipments, the specifications for which were more particularly described on the back of the contract. The parties of the second part hereby agree to furnish suitable lands for said building, together with sufficient water on said lot for the use of the business, and they shall be credited therefor as a payment on this contract the sum of $——. And it is further understood that in case the said second party shall fail to furnish said land and water within ten days after the execution of this contract, then the said Davis & Rankin, at their option, may furnish said land and water.

"Davis & Rankin further agree to provide and keep hired, at the expense of the stockholders, an experienced butter and cheese maker for one year, if desired.

"Said Davis & Rankin agree to erect said butter and cheese factory as set forth by the above specifications for $—— payable in cash.

"We, the subscribers hereto, agree to pay the above amount for said butter and cheese factory, when completed. Said building to be completed within ninety days or thereabout after the above amount ($——) is subscribed. All subscriptions to this contract to bear interest at the rate of eight per cent per annum from date of completion until paid.

"As soon as the above amount of $—— is subscribed, or in a reasonable time thereafter, the said subscribers agree to incorporate under the laws of the state, as therein provided, fixing

Each signature to a subscription paper in aid of a railroad constitutes a separate contract, and if one subscriber adds to his signature a certain condition an action will lie against him upon complying with that condition although others added other conditions which have not been complied with. Miller v. Preston, 4 N. M. 314.

The action will lie against one alone. George v. Harris, 4 N. H. 533, 17 Am. Dec. 446.

A separate action may be maintained by each subscriber to recover back the amount paid under a subscription paper reading, "We, the subscribers, do most cheerfully agree to pay the sums written against our names," although a joint receipt was given for payment made in satisfaction of the subscription; the subscriptions being several, the character of the transaction was not changed by the form of the receipt. Carter v. Carter, 14 Pick. 424.

Under a contract "that we do promise and agree that we will indemnify and save harmless the committee" for the money borrowed to complete the building "in the proportion to the number of shares for which we have respectively subscribed," the subscription paper reading "We do hereby promise and agree to take the number of shares set against our respective names and to pay the amount therefor," the subscribers are not copartners but merely shareholders in certain proportions, and a separate action at law could be maintained against each. The number could have no effect on the amount to be paid by each, and there would be no right of contribution. Hall v. Thayer, 12 Met. 180.

The following covenant was held to be several: "We, the subscribers, hereby mutually bind ourselves to each other jointly and severally to pay, each according to his relative respective interest and proportion in said land, all costs and charges and expenses which shall or may be incurred" in certain actions, which were to be brought to recover their possession. Ludlow v. McCrea, 1 Wend. 223.

A contract, "We promise to pay the following subscriptions," will be held to bind each for only the amount set opposite his name, although there are no words in the contract limiting it to that amount. Landwerlen v. Wheeler, 106 Ind. 523.

An agreement to pay the sum "annexed to their names" is several. Moss v. Wilson, 40 Cal. 159.

A contract that "we promise to pay the sum annexed to each of our names" is several. Robertson v. March, 4 Ill. 198.

A contract, "We agree to pay the sum set to our respective names," will sustain a separate action. Watkins v. Eames, 9 Cush. 537.

A contract for the purpose of building a meeting-house which provides, "We promise to pay the sum annexed to our individual names, the meeting-house being finished will be the property of the subscribers in proportion to the amount invested by each individual," makes the subscribers tenants in common and not partners, within the jurisdiction of equity to settle partnership affairs. Woodward v. Cowing, 41 Me. 9, 66 Am. Dec. 211.

But in Darnell v. Lyon, 85 Tex. 455, it is intimated that if the contract was simply, "We hereby promise and agree," the undertaking would be joint; although it is decided that the insertion of a provision that "each subscriber shall be liable for only the amount set opposite his name makes the obligation several.

And in Galt v. Swain, 9 Gratt. 633, 60 Am. Dec. 311, a bill against the subscribers jointly was brought on a subscription contract for the building of a church.

Stock subscriptions.

There seems to be no question but that subscriptions to the stock of corporations are separate ob-the aggregate amount of stock at not less than $——, to be divided into shares of $100 each. Said share or shares as above stated to be issued to the subscribers hereto in proportion to their paid up interest herein.

"It is further distinctly understood by and between the parties hereto that if the subscriptions hereto shall amount to more than $—— and less than $—— the foregoing agreement, designated "Contract A," shall constitute the agreement between the parties. If the subscriptions hereto shall amount to more than $—— and less than $—— then the foregoing agreement designated as "Contract B," shall constitute the agreement between the parties; and if the subscription hereto shall amount to over $—— then the foregoing agreement designated as "Contract C," shall constitute the agreement between the parties hereto.

"For the faithful and full performance of our respective parts of the above contract, we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns.

"Executed and dated this — day of —, 18—."

The element of mutual assent, both in law and in morals, lies at the foundation of all contracts, and where this is wanting there is no binding obligation.

Where the party intentionally or by design misrepresents a material fact, or produces a false impression, in order to mislead another, or to entrap or cheat him, or to obtain an undue advantage of him,—in every such case there is a positive fraud in the truest sense of the term. There is an evil act with an evil intent—dolum malum ad circumveniendum. And the misrepresentation may be as well by deeds or acts, as by words; by artifices to mislead as well as by positive assertions.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 192; 1 Benjamin, Sales, § 640.

As against an illiterate person who is unable to read the contract and has no knowledge of its language or contents, a representation as to its meaning and effect is a representation of a fact, on which he has a right to rely, and against which he is entitled to relief, if injured.

In such a case as between the original parties, though all the signatures are to one paper. The wording of the contract is doubtless usually such as to make them several, but even when the language has been doubtful the uniform construction has been that each was separate.

Each subscription to the stock of a proposed corporation. "We do hereby agree with said corporation to take the number of shares respectively placed against our names," constitutes an independent undertaking, in no way affected by the terms of other subscriptions. Connecticut & P. Rivers R. Co. v. Bailey, 24 Vt. 465, 58 Am. Dec. 181.

A contract, "We promise to pay $25 for each share of stock opposite each of our names," while in form joint is to be treated as several, and each stockholder is liable separately for the amount opposite his own name. Price v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 18 Ind. 187.

A contract, "We do hereby subscribe for the number of shares set to our respective names and hereby promise that we will pay for the same at the rate of $10 for each share by us subscribed," will maintain a separate action against each subscriber. Ives v. Sterling, 6 Met. 310.

Subscriptions to corporate stock are separate contracts. Whitlessy v. Frantz, 74 N. Y. 456.

One signing a subscription paper to the capital stock of a railroad company, in which each subscriber severally agrees to take the number of shares set opposite his name—in his own name for a certain number of shares and again as executor for a certain number of shares may be sued upon each subscription, and the pendency of one suit is no bar to the other. Erie & N. Y. City R. Co. v. Patrick, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 72, 2 Keyes, 256.

Contracts in which there is a promisee.

In some few cases a distinction has been made between the simple subscription contracts in which 22 L. R. A.

there is no promisee and which do not become binding until acted on, and those in which the promise by the subscribers is met by a promise or undertaking on the other side so that the contract is binding as soon as it is complete. This distinction does not, however, appear to have found much favor, for the general practice has been to construe both classes of contracts by the same rules.

A contract by the owner of property to sell it for a certain price, to be divided into shares of a certain amount, to parties who subscribe for such shares, each subscriber agreeing severally for himself and not jointly, was construed by the supreme court of New York to be a separate contract on the part of each subscriber, so that a separate action could be maintained against him on his subscription; but that the interests in the property were jointly holden, so that the contract was not complete until all the shares were subscribed for. The latter holding was, however, reversed by the court of errors, and it was held that the action would lie, although some of the shares were not subscribed for. Sandford v. Halsey, 2 Denio, 255; Sandford v. Handy, 25 Wend. 475.

In Frost v. Williams (S. Dak.) Jan. 21, 1892, the party of the first part in consideration of the sum of $300, to be paid by the second parties, agreed to build and run a cheese factory, and the contract provided, "We," the parties of the second part, "guarantee the above named sum of money," and the contract was signed by a number of persons, with a certain sum set opposite each name. The court held it to be a several and not a joint contract, placing some reliance on the fact that the factory, when completed, was not to be the property of the second parties.

Most of the cases of this class have arisen out of this Davis and Rankin contract. And it has been held that—or those standing in their shoes, the party to whom the misrepresentation of the instrument is made has a right to rely on the same and is not guilty of negligence or want of care in not seeking other information.

Mazfeld v. Schwartz, supra; Aultman v. Olson, 84 Minn. 453.

And even where the party can read he has a right to rely on the representation, and it is not necessarily negligence to omit to read or examine the instrument.

Albany City Sav. Inst. v. Burdick, 87 N. Y. 40; Mead v. Bunn, 82 N. Y. 275.

To constitute a fraudulent misrepresentation, it is not necessary that statements should be made in terms expressly affirming the existence of some untrue fact.

Bigelow, Fr. p. 5; Lee v. Jones, 17 C. B. N. S. 482; Albitz v. Minneapolis & P. R. Co. supra; Mianer v. Russell, 29 Mich. 229.

The fraudulent representations which may be questioned are not necessarily limited to the contents or effect of the instrument, but may relate wholly to the consideration or inducement for the same.

Elass v. Moore's Hill Male & Female Collegiate Inst. 77 Ind. 72; Albitz v. Minneapolis & P. R. Co. and Cummings v. Thompson, supra.

It is not necessary that the false representations should have been the sole motive; it is enough if they had a material influence upon plaintiff although combined with other motives.

Moline-Milburn Co. v. Franklin, 87 Minn. 137.

When it appears that the representations are material and false, the burden will be thrown upon the party making them to show that they were not relied on by the other party.

Fishback v. Miller, 15 Nev. 428; Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, 75; Holbrook v. Burt, 22 Pick. 546.

A subscription contract for the erection of a butter and cheese factory which reads, "We, the subscribers hereto, agree to pay the above amount," naming the whole contract price, is not a joint contract which will render each liable for the whole amount and permit all to be sued jointly, if each subscriber place after his name the number of shares he will take and the amount to be paid therefor. Davis & R. Bldg. & Mfg. Co. v. Barber, 51 Fed. Rep. 148.

The contract has also been held to be several in Davis v. Belford, 70 Mich. 120; Gibbons v. Grimsel, 79 Wis. 385.

But in Davis v. Shafer, 50 Fed. Rep. 764, the contract was held to be a joint one, although the addition to a signature of the words, "only responsible for three shares," limited the responsibility of that signer to the amount so stated.

So Davis v. Bronson, 16 L. R. A. 655, 2 N. Dak. 800, holds the contract to be joint, and in discussing the right of one subscriber to withdraw from his contract, the court distinguishes the case from those of voluntary subscription, on the ground that in the latter cases the consideration for each subscription was the promise of the other subscribers, while in this case the consideration was the promise of the other contracting party.

Effect of agreements among subscribers and their relation to each other.

Messrs. D. Wilcox and Taylor, Calhoun & Rhodes, for respondent:

A party cannot sign an instrument without reading it or asking that it be read, and thereby be relieved from liability on the instrument so signed for the reason that he did not know all its contents.

McCall v. Bushnell, 41 Minn. 37; Parlin v. Small, 68 Me. 289; Brown v. Blunt, 72 Me. 415; Martin v. Berens, 67 Pa. 459; Cannon v. Jackson, 40 Ark. 417; Cummings v. Baars, 36 Minn. 350; Barteau v. Barteau, 45 Minn. 132.

The complaint shows a right of action in plaintiff. If there are other provisions that change this right, defendant should set them forth in his answer as a defense.

Jones v. Ewing, 22 Minn. 157.

The manifest purpose was that each such subscriber should thus pay the amount of his particular subscription, and not that he should become liable jointly with all the other subscribers for the aggregate amount of all the subscriptions. In other words, the amount which each subscriber thus agreed to pay was limited to the amount which he thus subscribed; otherwise a few responsible subscribers might be made liable for numerous irresponsible subscribers. The interest of the respective subscribers in the contract was manifestly intended to be separate, and hence the liability thereby created was severable.

Gibbons v. Grimsel, 79 Wis. 385; Landuerlen v. Wheeler, 106 Ind. 523.

The contract was not repudiated by one party so as to prevent performance by the other. In the case at bar the party supposed to have repudiated the contract consisted of sixty-seven persons, and only twenty-seven or twenty-eight united in the repudiation.

When several are joint obligors or parties, the only theory on which the act of one can be to incorporate, and that the stock to which a subscriber is entitled has been taken and paid for by a third person, will not relieve the subscriber from his liability to pay his subscription. Davis v. Johnson, 49 Mo. App. 240.

One subscriber to a creamery contract will be bound by the action of his associates for the common benefit, if he never objects to them until called upon to pay his subscription. Gibbons v. Ellis, 88 Wis. 434.

If the agreement is between the subscribers to contribute money for the erection of a building for business purposes, it may constitute them partners, and one subscriber may be sued for his subscription by the other signers. White v. Scott, 26 Kan. 476.

Where, in a contract of subscription by several, there is no agreement between the various subscribers to pay or guarantee the payment of each others subscriptions, and afterwards one subscriber fails to advance the amount which he has agreed to loan, another subscriber who has paid his subscription cannot, upon obtaining judgment against the borrower, thereafter compel the delinquent promisor as garnishee in attachment to pay his subscription. Nellis v. Coleman, 98 Pa. 465.

An offer to subscribe money to a corporation provided it will do a certain thing may be withdrawn by each subscriber at any time before it is accepted. Hence the death of a subscriber before acceptance will revoke the subscription. Wallace v. Townsend, 43 Ohio St. 537, 54 Am. Rep. 829.

held to bind or affect the others is that of agency. By associating themselves together each clothes each of the others with the power to act for him and bind him by such acts. The case of Davis v. Bronson, 16 L. R. A. 655, 2 N. Dak. 300, assumes that any one can act for the whole to the extent of repudiating the contract and that all are bound by and responsible for such repudiation. With all due deference to that court we must insist that both principle and authority fall far short of sustaining that position.

In the government of the majority there is a distinction between public and private bodies. (Story, Partn. 182.) In the latter the power of the majority is strictly limited to acts that come within the object for which the association was formed, and they can exercise no power not contemplated in the inception of the contract. They cannot change, abrogate, or extend the terms of it. When a diversity of opinion exists as to the conduct and management of the business, or other purpose for which the parties have combined, the opinion of the majority must govern, provided the minority have been consulted.

It seems to us that any one examining this contract must conclude that the intention of the parties was to limit the liability of each subscriber to the amount set opposite his name, and not to impose upon him the liabilities of a joint obligor.

Davis v. Belford, 70 Mich. 120; Frost v. Williams (S. Dak.) Jan. 21, 1892.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contract out of which this litigation arises was an executory one, entered into by Davis & Rankin, of the first part, (by plaintiff, who was then their agent, and has succeeded to their rights under the contract by assignment,) and defendant, with some sixty other persons, as parties of the second part. In it the parties of the first part agreed to erect and complete a butter and cheese factory for those of the second part within ninety days after the amount of the contract price had been obtained by subscription,—the scheme being to secure subscribers to the stock of a corporation in shares of $100 each; and the parties of the second part agreed to pay the contract price in three installments, commencing upon the completion. The defendant subscribed for one share, and is sued for the sum of $100.

Without stopping to consider other points referred to by counsel for appellant, we proceed to an examination of one which goes directly to respondent's right to maintain an action for any part of the contract price, as such, although the factory has been completed in accordance with the terms of the contract. It was undisputed that soon after it was entered into, but before Davis & Rankin had commenced to perform, a meeting of those who had signed as parties of the second part was held. The plaintiff attended and participated. At this meeting a large majority of those present—defendant being of the number—voted and determined that they would go no further in the enterprise, and that the factory should not be built. The plaintiff was then and there notified not to erect the factory, and to proceed no further under the contract. He responded in somewhat vigorous language, and declared that the factory should be erected inside of two weeks. As agent of Davis & Rankin, he then proceeded to erect and equip the plant. Defendant and others refused to accept it when completed, or to pay. The question is as to the power of the parties of the second part to repudiate and arbitrarily break their contract, by refusing to perform, and by renouncing all liability under it, and thereby prevent Davis & Rankin from recovering the full contract price, should they disregard the breach and fully perform on their part. There seems to be no room for doubt upon this subject. While a contract is executory a party has the power to stop performance on the other side by an explicit direction to that effect, subjecting himself to such damages as will compensate the other party for being stopped in the performance on his part at that stage in the execution of the contract. The party thus forbidden cannot afterwards go on, and thereby increase the damages, and then recover such damages of the other party. Danforth v. Walker, 37 Vt. 239; Clark v. Maraglia, 1 Denio, 317, 68 Am. Dec. 670; Butler v. Butler, 77 N. Y. 472, 33 Am. Rep. 648; Collins v. Delaporte, 115 Mass. 159. The question is very fully considered in the recent case of Davis v. Bronson, 2 N. Dak. 300, 16 L. R. A. 655, in which cases other than those above noted are referred to.

The legal right, on general principles, of either party, to violate, abandon, or renounce his contract, on the usual terms of compensation to the other for the damages which the law recognizes and allows,—subject to the jurisdiction of equity to decree specific performance in proper cases—is universally recognized and acted upon. Among the many authorities which might be cited on this, see Bishop, Cont. par. 887; Leake, Cont. 868, 1044; 1 Sutherland, Damages, 113; 2 Sutherland, Damages, 198, 526; Hinckley v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. 121 U. S. 264, 30 L. ed. 967; American L. Ins. Co. v. McAden, 109 Pa. 899; Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 112; Roper v. Johnson, L. R. 8 C. P. 167; Laird v. Pim, 7 Mees. & W. 474; Hochster v. De La Tour, 2 El. & Bl. 678.

From an examination of the adjudged cases just cited, it will be seen that ordinarily the party who is willing to abide by an executory contract may treat it as subsisting up to the time when performance should commence, for the purpose of insisting that the other party, who has previously repudiated it, shall then and finally determine whether he will comply with its terms, or persist in his resolution not to perform upon his part. But the party who has not broken his compact is not allowed to treat it as in force, for the purpose of performing in direct opposition to the refusal of the other to abide by its terms, and then enforce the payment of the contract price. One reason for this is found in the general rule that a person who has been injured by a breach of contract must put forth reasonable exertion to render the injury as light as possible. He cannot negligently or willfully allow the damages to be unnecessarily enhanced; or, if he does, the increased loss falls upon him.

Gillilan, Ch. J., absent, (sick,) took no part.

A reargument was subsequently granted after which on December 8, 1892, Collins, J., delivered on behalf of the court the following opinion:

On the presentation of this case at the October term, 1891, appellant's counsel filed their brief, and made a short oral argument. Counsel for respondent were not present, submitting wholly on brief. After its service on the latter, there had been interpolated in appellant's brief the point that as he, with some twenty-eight other subscribers, renounced the contract before Davis & Rankin had commenced the erection of the factory building, their assignee could not recover upon the contract, but was relegated to an action for damages, caused by the breach thereof. The decision which followed was squarely placed upon that ground. Later, 22 L. R. A.

by petition for reargument, it appeared that through an oversight the attention of respondent's counsel had not been called to the point, or to the fact that it had been injected into appellant's brief, and, as a consequence, no reference had been made to it by them. For this reason a reargument was ordered.

In the original opinion the true character of the contract signed by defendant and sixty-seven other persons as the parties of the second part was not considered. The respondent's counsel, in order to maintain their action, had to contend that it was several, to the extent of the obligation to pay, at least, and, without deciding the point, we assumed that they were right, although it was strenuously urged by counsel for appellant that his liability was joint, and hence an action against a single subscriber could not be maintained. We are now obliged to consider and determine the real nature of the contract, in order to dispose of a very troublesome question arising on reargument, namely, the right of one or more of these who, as subscribers, became the parties of the second part, to repudiate and renounce the contract, without regard to the wishes or acts of his or their associates. Contracts, in substance the same as the one before us, were construed in Davis & R. Blg. & Mfg. Co. v. Barber, 51 Fed. Rep. 148; Davis v. Belford, 70 Mich. 120; Gibbons v. Grinsel, 79 Wis. 885; and Frost v. Williams (S. Dak.) 50 N. W. Rep. 964,—as creating a several liability on the part of each subscriber to the amount set down by him opposite his name, on which he might be sued severally; while in Davis v. Shafer, 50 Fed. Rep. 764, an opposite conclusion was reached, it being held that the subscribers to such an agreement became jointly and severally obligated to pay the entire amount of the subscriptions. In none of these cases was the question now before us involved, but in Davis v. Bronson, 2 N. Dak. 300, 16 L. R. A. 655, cited in our former opinion, it was raised on reargument, and disposed of adversely to the respondent's views; but of that hereafter. Nor was there anything to suggest in either of the cases first referred to, wherein the obligation to pay was declared several, and not joint, that the contract of the subscribers might be pronounced several in one particular,—for instance, as to the liability to pay,—and joint in all other features. After a careful consideration of the authorities heretofore cited, and others which have a bearing, we are convinced that the better reasoning and the correct conclusion is with those in which it has been held that the contract imposed nothing more than a several liability upon the subscribers, each agreeing to pay the amount of his subscription and nothing more. This has been the practical construction of the contract by the party of the first part, and, we think, the only one which can be sustained under the ordinary rules for construing written instruments. Having determined that the obligation to pay was several, each subscriber being responsible to the amount of his subscription only, we reach the principal question before mentioned, which is, putting it in another form, Can each of the subscribers, after all of the subscriptions have been obtained, but the contract itself is executory, be regarded as a separate contractor, possessing the power to repudiate and renounce for himself alone and independently of the other signers, or must the sixty-eight persons who have executed it as the party of the second part be treated as a single person, and required to act as a unit, if any or all desire to repudiate and renounce? The question is an exceedingly difficult one to answer satisfactorily. It must be conceded that, if one or any number less than the entire body of the subscribers may repudiate and renounce, the parties of the first part must consequently be absolved from their obligation to construct and equip the factory; they must necessarily be released from a duty to proceed, and also from all liability arising out of nonperformance to those who may be styled the "persistent subscribers." It could not be held that the parties of the first part are under an obligation to the subscribers last mentioned to complete the work, for, if they were, it would be incumbent upon them to fulfill a contract without the right to recover the contract price, and with full knowledge that from the repudiating and defaulting subscribers they could only recover, as for a breach of the contract, the damages, to be measured as of the time of the repudiation or renouncement. It can then be safely asserted that if one, or any number less than all, of the subscribers may lawfully repudiate or renounce the contract, each for himself, no duty to proceed and no liability in case of a failure so to do rests upon the other parties. In Davis v. Bronson, supra, this view was taken, undoubtedly, and it would seem also that the contract was therein regarded as joint in all respects; and because the persistent subscribers had no cause of action for a breach of contract, and because all were regarded as responsible in damages to the parties of the first part for the default or breach of one, it was held that one could absolutely terminate the contract as to all by repudiation or renouncement. We might be prepared to coincide in the view that no action for damages would lie against the other parties if one of these subscribers could thus end the contract, but we cannot concur in the statement that each and all of the subscribers are liable, as for breach of the contract, if one chooses to repudiate or renounce. Upon principle, we do not think this statement can be sustained, even if we had followed Davis v. Shafer, supra, and held the contract joint and several in all respects. The logic of the reasoning in Davis v. Bronson is that any one of the subscribers to a contract of this kind can act for all to the extent of repudiating it, and that all are bound by and responsible for his acts. Any one is the agent of all, and by associating themselves together as promoters of the enterprise their interest is such that each is clothed with authority to act for and bind each of the others. Every subscriber has become the agent of his associates, for it is only upon the principle of agency that even joint obligors or parties can be held to have authority to act for or bind each other. If this be the law, and repudiation by one repudiates for all, because of the joint interest which exists between the parties, we fail to see why this joint interest is not sufficient to permit one to change and alter the contract in behalf of all, or to rescind it altogether. Of course, such a position would be wholly untenable.

If this was a several contract in all respects, one of the subscribers, as an independent contractor, could not be denied a right to repudiate it for himself, leaving the parties of the first part under obligations to fulfill as to the balance of the signers. This duty to fulfill would continue so long as one of the subscribers remained faithful. From him the amount of his subscription could be collected, and from the defaulters damages, to be measured, as before stated, as of the day of the repudiation. Nothing could be more unjust, and the contract ought not to be so construed, unless it be demanded by the language thereof. There is nothing in the fact that the obligation to pay has been made several which indicates that in all other particulars the obligation of each subscriber is separate and distinct; nor can we gather from any part of the contract that there was any intent, except in the manner of payment, to make the obligation a several one. Certainly the subscribers did not so understand it, for the repudiation and renouncement relied upon by defendant were by means of a motion made and carried at a meeting held by them, a majority of all being present, but less than a majority of all voting in favor of the motion. We are therefore of the opinion that, while the obligation to pay was several and independent, the subscribers jointly shared the burden, and were united in interest in all other respects. Taken as a whole, the instrument was of a very peculiar character, and evidently, until a stock company was formed, (and it was agreed that this should be done when the full amount of the subscriptions had been obtained,) it was not intended that even a majority should govern or control. It follows that unanimous consent would have to be secured before the contract could be repudiated and renounced. But, if the obligation to pay had been joint, instead of several, thus making the contract joint in all particulars, it is difficult to see by what authority one or more of the subscribers could repudiate for all; the inevitable result being to change the relations existing between the contracting parties. There is nothing in the relation of joint debtors from which authority or agency to alter or extend a liability can be inferred. With simple joint contractors, neither is the agent of the other, and their individual liability is not to be extended beyond their own acts and contracts. Non can an agency or authority be inferred because of the joint relations or united interests assumed by the signers concerning other matters of the contract; for instance, the agreement to form a stock company for the management of the factory when the subscription should be complete. The conclusion heretofore reached in respect to the effect of the action at the meeting was erroneous, but this fact will not change the result. A new trial must be had, because the court below failed to submit to the jury the question presented by the testimony as to fraudulent representation and concealment, made when the defendant signed the contract, by plaintiff, who was then acting as agent for Davis & Rankin. The defendant was a foreigner, and unable to read the English language. The plaintiff went to his house with the contract fully completed, and already signed by others. It was in triplicate form, containing conditions that have caused the courts considerable trouble, as witness the cases heretofore referred to in which these contracts have demanded interpretation. It is conceded that the defendant could not and did not read the skillfully drawn document, nor was it read to him. The plaintiff pretended to explain its terms, and the testimony tends to show that material facts were misrepresented and false impressions produced, in order to secure his signature. It is true that the effect of his testimony as to what actually occurred, what was said and done when the plaintiff prevailed upon him to sign, was somewhat weakened by admissions, the result of a skillful cross-examination, no doubt, but there was still an issue between the parties on this question, which should have gone to the jury.

We adhere to the conclusion that a new trial must be had.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

W. L. CABELL et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

H. D. ARNOLD.

1. A warrant in the hands of a marshal or sheriff will not justify a deputy, who does not have possession of it in making an arrest, where the statutes require the warrant to be exhibited on request to the person arrested.

2. Liability for an unlawful arrest and detention does not exist merely because the officer who made it did not have a warrant therefor in his possession, if such warrant had been issued and no hurt resulted to the accused because of the fact that the officer did not have the warrant.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Palo Pinto County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged false imprisonment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. T. Watts for plaintiff in error.

Mr. B. G. Bidwell, for defendant in error:

A warrant for the arrest of appellee being in Dallas, Texas, did not authorize his arrest in Palo Pinto County, Texas, by deputies who did not have the warrant with them when the arrest was made, and the fact that he was told that such a warrant had been issued will not defeat his action for an illegal arrest.

Tex. Code Crim. Proc. arts. 226, 281; Johnson v. State, 5 Tex. App. 48; Alford v. State, 8 Tex. App. 545; Pratt v. Brown, 80 Tex. 606; Harris v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 85 Fed. Rep. 116; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 740, note 1; Bomerville v. Richards, 37 Mich.

If the officer had authority to arrest Arnold without a warrant, it was then clearly his duty to take him before the nearest justice of the peace or other officer named in the United States statutes. This was not done, but Arnold was denied the right to give bail at home, and was carried to Dallas and there placed in jail as a common felon. If the original arrest was wrongful those who made it are answerable to Arnold for his subsequent detention.

Bath v. Metcalf, supra.

It cannot be contended that Arnold cannot now recover for a wrongful arrest because he did not resist the officers.

Harris v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co., and Cooley, Torts, supra.

This is a suit for false imprisonment, which is very different from one for malicious prosecution.

Plaintiff sues for actual damages alone; pain and mental anxiety and suffering are such.

That Cabell acted in good faith in making an affidavit for a warrant cannot prejudice the rights of Arnold. There is no mitigation of actual damages.

Stayton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

W. L. Cabell, as United States marshal, held a valid warrant authorizing the arrest

NOTE.—The above decision points out a very notable distinction in denying civil liability for an arrest without exhibiting the warrant therefor which had in fact been issued while admitting the illegality of such arrest.

For right to resist illegal arrest, see note to State v. Hunter (N. C.) 8 L. R. A. 529.

For note on right to enter dwellings to make arrest, see DeLaforce v. State (N. J.) 16 L. R. A. 500.

of H. D. Arnold, on a charge of felony, under the laws of the United States. That warrant was issued by a commissioner at Dallas, and delivered to Cabell, who remained in Dallas, and retained the warrant, but, by telegram, directed one of his deputies to go to Palo Pinto county, and arrest Arnold and others named in the warrant. The deputy and a special deputy made the arrest in Palo Pinto county without any warrant being in their possession, authorizing the arrest, and conveyed Arnold from the place where arrested to Dallas, and there delivered him to the marshal. Arnold was confined in jail one night, and then brought before the commissioner, by whom he was admitted to bail until final examination, upon which, after considerable delay, he was discharged. This action was brought against Cabell and the sureties on his official bond to recover damages for false imprisonment, based on the proposition that the arrest and detention until Arnold was placed under the control of the marshal were illegal, because the deputies had not the writ in their possession at the time the arrest was made, nor during the journey to Dallas. The jury were instructed that the arrest and detention by the deputies without having the warrant in their possession were illegal, and that Arnold was entitled to recover for the arrest and detention until he was delivered to the marshal, at Dallas; and, under this instruction, verdict and judgment went in his favor. On appeal the same ruling was made by the court of civil appeals, and from that decision writ of error is now prosecuted.

The arrest and detention all occurred within the district within which Cabell was marshal, and the material facts transpiring at the time are thus stated by Arnold: "Sisk [one of the deputies] then told me that they wanted me to go to Dallas, Tex.; that Gen. Cabell had telegraphed him to arrest me. They then told me that they would have to carry me. I asked them if they had any papers for my arrest. Sisk said he had none. They did not show me any, but Sisk said there were some at Dallas for me. Gerrin [the other deputy] said, later on, that, if ordered by Cabell, he would arrest one as quick without a warrant as with one. I told them I had to go by home. They carried me by home, and I got my clothes. I did not resist arrest. They carried me to Weatherford, and carried me to Dallas." No facts are shown which would have justified the arrest of Arnold without the issuance of a warrant, and we have the question whether, when a lawful warrant has been issued, and placed in the hands of a marshal or sheriff, his deputy may make an arrest without having the warrant in his possession at the time, without subjecting his principal to liability in a civil action brought by the person arrested. The determination of this question must depend upon the laws in force in this state, prescribing the powers and duties of sheriffs and their deputies. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 788.

The sufficiency of the warrant that went into the hands of the marshal is not questioned, and the statutes bearing on the question of its proper execution provide that all reasonable means are permitted to be used to effect it; that no greater force shall be used than is necessary to secure the arrest and detention of the accused; and that "in executing a warrant of arrest it shall always be made known to the person accused under what authority the arrest is made, and if requested the warrant shall be exhibited to him." Code Crim. Proc. arts. 255, 257. When the Code of Criminal Procedure fails to provide a rule of procedure in any particular state of case which may arise, the rules of the common law must be applied, and govern. Code Crim. Proc. art. 37.

It will not be questioned that the deputies had the same authority to arrest as would have had the marshal, under the same circumstances. It has been held in England, and in some of the courts of this country, that a person may use necessary force to resist arrest, in a case in which a warrant is necessary to authorize it, unless the officer, at the place and time he attempts to make the arrest, has the warrant in his possession, and that such violence towards the officer will not constitute a battery, or other like offense, and, further, that the absence of the warrant may affect the grade of offense committed by violent resistance resulting in the death of the officer. Galliard v. Laxton, 9 Cox, C. C. 127; Codd v. Cube, L. R. 1 Exch. Div. 352; Reg. v. Chapman, 12 Cox, C. C. 4; People v. McLean, 71 Mich. 809; Webb v. State, 51 N. J. L. 189.

In those cases, warrants existed which would have authorized an arrest. In crimes such as assault, battery, or homicide, the animus with which the act is done becomes an element of the offense; and it may very properly be held, where the arrest of a person is attempted without warrant, in a case in which warrant is necessary, that resistance was under the belief that the act was an unauthorized interference with right to personal liberty, which every person has the right to resist by the use of such force as is necessary. In such cases the existence of the writ, if not present, ought not to deprive the person resisting arrest of the right to act and base his belief upon the facts as they then appeared to him, and to have his intent, upon being charged with crime, determined thereby. The cases referred to, in general terms, declare arrest illegal, in cases in which warrant is necessary, unless the warrant be in the possession of the officer at time and place of arrest; but they were all criminal cases, in which the animus of the party resisting was a vital question. It ought not to be denied that the law contemplates that the warrant directing the arrest of a person charged with crime will be in the possession of the officer when he makes an arrest under it, for he is required to exhibit it, if called upon to do so; and this is based on a wise public policy, one purpose of which is that the officer may have to exhibit such evidence of his authority to make the arrest as will be deemed sufficient to take from the person whose arrest is commanded all right to question the authority of the officer. Does it, however, follow from this that the absence of the warrant at the time and place of arrest, if in fact a valid warrant was in possession of the officer commanding him to make the arrest, will entitle the person arrested to maintain a civil action as for trespass or false imprisonment? The correct answer to this must depend upon a determination of the facts which confer authority on an officer to arrest a person charged with crime, for, if the authority exists, an irregular exercise of it cannot give cause for civil action, unless that irregularity or mode of execution be of a character to work loss or deprivation of freedom of action to the person arrested, which would not have followed arrest in every respect regular. When it is said that arrest may be made without warrant, it is meant that the issuance of warrant is unnecessary; but, as no facts are shown to have existed that would have authorized the arrest of Arnold without warrant, it is unnecessary to inquire when such arrests may be made.

The first fact necessary to confer authority on a sheriff, or officer of like powers, in a case in which warrant is necessary, is the existence of a warrant, issued by some magistrate or court having power under the law to issue it, commanding him to make the arrest. If the warrant be issued by such magistrate or tribunal, and be in the form prescribed by law, so far as the officer is concerned to whom it is directed, it must be treated as conclusive evidence that the preliminary facts were shown which authorized it to issue. The next step is the delivery of the warrant to the person who is commanded to execute it, and, when so delivered, the officer's obligation, and duty to obey its command, become fixed, and it is clear that authority to do the act commanded must co-exist with the obligation or duty. These are the essentials which confer on a sheriff, or like officer, the authority to arrest on warrant, and so long as they continue operative the authority must exist. The manner and circumstances of execution relate not to the authority, unless expressly or by necessary intendment made to; and, if the law prescribes the modes of execution, this is either to secure the execution of the process, or to guard the person whose arrest is commanded from unnecessary annoyance or oppression, and a departure in this respect ought not to affect the question of authority. But if legal injury results to the person arrested, through departure from the procedure prescribed, this would give ground for civil action; but no legal injury could result if the officer, acting within the territory to which his duties pertain, uses no more force in executing a valid warrant than is necessary, and in other respects obeys the writ. If an officer uses more force than is necessary to arrest and detain, he becomes civilly liable, in so far as would any other wrongdoer; and if he refuses to exhibit the warrant, when called upon to do so, or to make known under what authority he assumes the right to arrest, he may thereby forfeit the right he would otherwise have to compensation for hurt received by force, and in resisting arrest. State v. Plinney, 42 Me. 390. If a person arrested should ask a court to discharge him on the ground that more force was used than necessary to arrest and detain him, on the ground that he was not informed at time of arrest of the authority under which the officer was acting, or that the warrant was not exhibited to him on demand, no court would discharge him, if it appeared that the arrest was made under a valid warrant delivered to an officer authorized to execute it, who, in person or by deputy, had made the arrest. This would follow because the arrest and detention would be under the authority of law, and therefore legal. "If the officer expressly declare that he arrests under an illegal precept and on that only, yet he is not guilty of false imprisonment, if he had at the time a legal one; for the lawfulness of the arrest does not depend on what he says, but what he has. State v. Kirby, 24 N. C. 201; State v. Elrod, 28 N. C. 250. Undoubtedly, if the jailer had discharged the plaintiff, the sheriff would have been liable for an escape on Jones' execution: for the jailer is the sheriff's deputy, and bound to take notice of the writs in the hands of his superior, and a detention by the jailer is justified, if one by the sheriff himself would have been, by the same process." Meeds v. Carver, 80 N. C. 298. The same rule as to legality of arrest was asserted by Lord Holt in Grenville v. College of Physicians, 12 Mod. 886.

In the case before us, it is not shown that any act was done in arresting and detaining the plaintiff that would not have been strictly lawful had the warrant been in the possession of the deputies at time and place of arrest, nor does it appear that plaintiff suffered any loss, indignity, inconvenience, or deprivation of freedom which he would not have suffered, had the warrant then been in their hands, and every step in the procedure contemplated by the statute strictly followed; under such circumstances we are of opinion that the charge of the court, to the effect that the warrant did not justify the arrest unless it was in possession of the deputies at time and place of arrest, was erroneous. Authority to make the arrest existing, the manner in which that power was exercised ought not to be held ground for civil action, unless therefrom hurt resulted to plaintiff, which would not necessarily have followed, had the exact procedure contemplated by the statute been pursued. Only one case has been found in which the rulings made in this case were sustained in a civil action based on like facts. Such seems to have been the ruling of the court of errors and appeals of New Jersey in the case of Smith v. Clark, 53 N. J. L. 197; but the authorities cited in that case all had application to the question that arises in a criminal case, where a person is charged with assault, assault and battery, or homicide growing out of force in resisting arrest, which are not believed to be applicable to this case.

For the errors in the charge of the court, the judgments of the District Court and Court of Civil Appeals will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

It is so ordered.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Re James S. BARBER'S ESTATE.

.....Conn.....)

1. It is reversible error to instruct the jury in a proceeding to establish a will that if from the whole evidence "it is left uncertain whether or not the testator was of sound mind, then it is left uncertain whether a person of sound mind, within the meaning of our statute, has made the will, and the will should not be sustained," although preceded by an intimation that the proponent has the burden of establishing the will by only a fair preponderance of evidence and followed by a statement that to defeat the will because of insane delusions they should be established by a "fair preponderance of evidence."
2. Although the burden is on the proponents of a will to establish the sanity of the testator, yet, after favorable testimony by the attesting witnesses, to defeat the will the testimony of contestants must so far overcome that of proponents as to neutralize the effect of the legal presumption of sanity.
3. To instruct the jury that the burden is on the proponents of a will to establish the testator's sanity and that they must fail if at the close of the evidence the "scales stand evenly balanced" without instructing as to the legal presumption of sanity, is reversible error.
4. The fact that many persons after conversing with a testator and observing his conduct believed him to be insane is not a proper one upon which to base a hypothetical question to an expert as to his capacity to form an opinion regarding testator's sanity,—at least if the conversations and descriptions of conduct are not stated; nor is the fact that persons who observed his conduct advised his wife that it was unsafe for her to remain alone with him.
5. In a hypothetical question to an expert as to his capacity to form an opinion regarding the sanity of a testator attacked because of an insane delusion as to the legitimacy of his children, which is based on their being disinherited, the true value of the estate and the amount given the children should be stated, and not the inventory value and the counsel's statement that the children's share was "Inconsiderable" and amounted to "practical disinheritance."
6. After enumerating a great number of facts as the basis for a hypothetical question to an expert it is improper to incorporate the entire testimony of a witness without stating it to be considered "in connection with" the other facts and propositions named.
7. A hypothetical question to an expert witness testifying to a person's mental condition about which he has no personal knowledge is improper, if it fails to present facts, which it includes, in their just and true relation and causes them to appear in one that is untrue and unjust.
8. An appeal from a probate decree approving or disapproving an alleged will is not an "action by or against the representatives of a deceased person" within the meaning of Gen. Stat., § 1094, making memoranda in his books evidence of the facts therein stated in such actions.

9. A large number of letters alleged to have called forth letters, copies of which in a testator's letter book have been admitted on the question of his mental capacity should not be laid in a mass before the jury unread, for them to examine or not as they should feel inclined; but absence of proof of authenticity, that they were received in due course of mail, or of any offer to produce their authors for examination, is not ground for rejecting them if they were found among testator's papers with his memoranda on them.

APPEAL by proponents from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County setting aside a will which had been admitted to probate by the Probate Court for the District of East Windsor. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. W. C. & W. S. Case, for appellants:

In actions by or against the representatives of deceased persons, the entries, memoranda, and declarations of the deceased relevant to the matter in issue may be received as evidence.

Gen. Stat. § 1094.

This is an action.

It is an action by or against the representatives of deceased persons.

Pisley v. Eddy, 56 Conn. 338.

The expert must know from the question itself just what the evidence truly shows, i. e., upon the assumptions of the questioner, or his answer is valueless.

Those interested in his answer must know from the question itself what the expert is believing to be the state of facts, in other words, what the evidence truly shows, or the answer is valueless.

In order properly to form an opinion, the witness should have had full information as to the ascertained or supposed state of facts upon which his opinion is based. He could not be called upon to determine the truth of the facts sworn to before giving such opinion. It is not his province to draw inferences from the evidence of other witnesses, or to take in such facts as he can recollect, and thus form an opinion.

Guiterman v. Liverpool, N. Y. & P. S. Co. supra.

What is "testamentary capacity" in this state?

The court in Dunham's App., 27 Conn. 207,

NOTE.—The subject of burden of proof as to a testator's competency which is very fully considered in the above case is exhaustively annotated with the case of Prentiss v. Bates (Mich.) 17 L. R. A. 22 L. R. A.

494, which is somewhat out of harmony with the weight of authority shown by that note and reinforced in the main by the case above.

says: "The proper inquiry in such cases is, Has the testator mind enough to know and appreciate his relations to the natural objects of his bounty, and the character and effect of the dispositions of his will? If he has, then he has a sound and disposing mind and memory, although his mind may not be entirely unimpaired."

In St. Leger's App., 34 Conn. 449, 91 Am. Dec. 739, the court said: "It was not necessary that the testator should have been capable of transacting business generally, but that he had sufficient capacity to make a will if he understood the business in which he was engaged and the elements of it, namely, if he recollected and understood, or in other words, comprehended, the nature and condition of his property, the persons who were or should be the natural objects of his bounty, and his relation to them, the manner in which he wished to distribute it among or withhold it from them, and the scope and bearing of the provisions of the will he was making."

The rule is thus stated in Richmond's App., 59 Conn. 245: "The law merely requires that the testator should be possessed of sufficient intelligence and memory to fairly and rationally know and comprehend the effect of what he is doing, and the nature and conditions of his property, to understand who are or should be the natural objects of his bounty, and his relations to them, the manner in which he wishes to distribute it among or withhold it from them, and the scope and bearing of the provisions of the will he is making."

In Comstock v. Hadlyme Ecl. Soc., 8 Conn. 261, 20 Am. Dec. 100, the court says: "Those who claim under the will must take upon themselves the burden of proof; and they must not only prove that the will was formally executed, but that the testator was of sound and disposing mind. And where there is necessity for any proof on the part of the plaintiff he ought to begin."

In Knox's App., 26 Conn. 22, the court states that without some evidence of capacity the law did not presume it, as in the ordinary case of a party who executes a deed or other contract.

Without what evidence of capacity? Without a preponderance of evidence on the whole case? Clearly not, or the court would have so stated—nor would it have recognized a presumption of the law unless such presumption exists.

There is but one thing that this phrase can mean, and that is, that the proponents must at the outset introduce their "statutory evidence" upon the statutory requirements, and this having been done, the presumption of law is established, and the burden of proof shifts to those who assail the will.

Denison's App. 29 Conn. 403; Field's App. 36 Conn. 277; Dale's App. 57 Conn. 132; Livingston's App. 63 Conn. 74.

In one sense there is no limit to the latitude which the law gives a testator in the disposition of his property. He may dispose of it by will, and the law concerns itself no farther than this. It is not therefore from the provisions of the will itself that the question of capacity is or can be determined, however apparently unjust or absurd they may appear, but it is from a consideration of the testator's reasons and motives taken in connection with them, for it must be remembered that testamentary capacity is evidenced as well by withholding as it is by giving.

St. Leger's App. supra.

Mr. John L. Hunter also for appellants.
Messrs. Charles H. Briscoe, Arthur F. Eggleston, and William J. McConville, for appellees:

In Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 470, 38 Am. Rep. 464, the court said: "The claim is that a hypothetical question may not be put to an expert unless it states the facts as they exist. It is manifest, if this is the rule, that in a trial where there is a dispute as to the facts, which can be settled only by the jury, there would be no room for a hypothetical question. The very meaning of the word is that it supposes, assumes something for the time being. Each side, in an issue or fact, has its theory of what is the true state of the facts, and assumes that it can prove it to be so, to the satisfaction of the jury; and so assuming, shapes hypothetical questions to experts accordingly. And such is the correct practice."

It is only required that the testimony should tend to establish every supposed fact embraced in the question.

Rogers, Expert Testimony, p. 40, and cases cited.

Such a question is not improper because it includes part of the facts in evidence.

Stearns v. Field, 90 N. Y. 640; Filer v. New York Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 42, 10 Am. Rep. 327; Hartnett v. Garvey, 66 N. Y. 641; Rogers, Expert Testimony, p. 40; Mercer v. Vose, 67 N. When the memoranda and the diaries were permitted to go to the jury as evidence on the question of sanity, they went to the jury for the only purpose for which they could go, the issue of sanity being the only issue to which the evidence in the cause is directed.

St. Leger's App. 34 Conn. 447, 91 Am. Dec. 735; Livingston's App. 63 Conn. 68.

The written memoranda of the testator stand upon the same footing with his oral declarations, and may be introduced in evidence for the same reasons and for none other than his oral declarations.

The question was whether the testator was of sound or unsound mind, and the burden was upon the proponents of the will to show that he was of a sound mind. The form of insanity had nothing to do with this burden.

Setting aside cases of dementia and loss of mind or intellect, the true test of insanity is mental delusion.

Where the mental disorder is a delusion upon one or a few particular subjects, the testimony of persons with whom he has not had occasion to speak on those subjects is of no weight.

American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper, 38 N. Y. 621; Hammond, Med. Jur. pp. 37, 76.

Fenn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An appeal having been taken to the superior court from an order and decree of the court of probate for the district of East Windsor, proving and approving an instrument purporting to be the last will and testament of one James S. Barber, disposing of a considerable estate, on the trial to the jury the validity of said instrument was contested, mainly on the ground that the alleged testator was not of sound and disposing mind and memory at the time of its execution. The jury returned a verdict setting aside said will, which was accepted by the court, and judgment rendered thereon. From that judgment an appeal was taken to this court, and several reasons assigned.

We will consider first, as of the greatest general importance, the exceptions to the charge to the jury. Upon the trial the proponents and present appellants, having introduced the alleged will, also introduced the evidence of the two surviving witnesses to the will, tending to prove, and which they claimed did prove, its due execution, and that the testator was of sound and disposing mind and memory at that time. They then rested, and the contestants went forward and introduced evidence to show the want of capacity, mainly, as was claimed, because of the existence of an insane delusion existing in the mind of said Barber in reference to the paternity of his children. This was met by evidence offered by the proponents in rebuttal. The court, in the course of its somewhat lengthy charge to the jury, made several more or less direct references to the subject of the burden of proof upon the question of capacity. We will quote such portions of these references as seem in any way material. Early in the charge, the court, having explained what constitutes testamentary capacity, said: "If, gentlemen, you are satisfied by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the testator had this kind of mental capacity, understanding, and strength at the time of making this will, it will be your duty to find that he was of sound mind, and, upon this issue, render a verdict for the proponents in favor of the will. If, on the other hand, you are not satisfied by a fair preponderance of evidence that the testator, at the time of executing this will, had the kind of mental strength and capacity which I have been describing to you, it will be your duty to find that he was not of sound mind, and your verdict should be for the contestants, and against the will. Gentlemen, the burden of proof as to the soundness of mind of the testator lies, in every case, on the parties relying on the will, and they must satisfy you that it is the will of a capable testator; and when the whole matter is before you, on evidence given on both sides, if the evidence does not, by a fair preponderance of it, satisfy you that the will is the will of a competent testator, you ought not to affirm, by your verdict that it is. In other words, if, when the whole matter is before you, on the evidence given on both sides, it is left uncertain whether or not the testator was of sound mind, then it is left uncertain whether a person of sound mind, within the meaning of our statute, has made the will, and the will should not be sustained. In the course of the trial, gentlemen, the balance of evidence may fluctuate from one side to the other, but the burden of proof remains where it was at the outset,—upon the advocates of the will; and unless, at the close of the trial, the balance is with the advocates of the will, unless the beam of the scale tips down on the side of the advocates of the will, they must fail. It is not sufficient that the scales stand evenly balanced. There must be a fair preponderance in the proponents' favor to justify a verdict sustaining a will. As I have before said to you, no person, unless of the age of eighteen years and of sound mind, can dispose of his or her property by will; hence, when the advocates or proponents of the will present the instrument, they must satisfy you by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the deceased, at the time he executed the will, belonged to the class of persons who by law can make wills." Towards the close of the charge, the court said: "In the case at bar the burden of proof is upon the executor to show that James S. Barber was, at the time of the execution of his alleged will, of a sound and disposing mind; and if, upon the whole evidence, you are uncertain whether James S. Barber, at the time of the execution of said alleged will, was of sound mind or not, then it is left uncertain whether, under the statute, he was capable of making a will, and it is your duty to render a verdict for the contestants. And I will further add, to render a will invalid, because of unsoundness of mind of the testator, it is not necessary to show that, at the time of making the supposed will, he was demented or an imbecile, and wholly deprived of sense. It is sufficient if you are satisfied by a fair preponderance of the evidence that he was affected with an insane delusion or delusions, and that the provisions in his will were the product of such insane delusion or delusions." The proponents, in their reasons of appeal, complain that this charge of the court, and especially the matter contained in the last quotation, (as well as in several other portions of the charge, which we have deemed it unnecessary to quote,) was confusing and contradictory. Confining our comments to the language quoted, we are constrained to say that it appears to us that there is some apparent foundation for this criticism. Taking the language used, strictly and without qualification, there would seem to be three conflicting rules, each distinctly stated: first, that the burden of proving that the will was the same act of the testator, by a fair preponderance of evidence, lies "in every case," and remains throughout the trial, upon the proponents of the instrument; second, that the burden on the proponents is not that of proof by a fair preponderance of evidence, but by such evidence as brings certainty upon the point to the minds of the triers; third, in order to defeat the probate of a will, on the ground of its being the product of an insane delusion or delusions, the jury should be satisfied, by a fair preponderance of evidence, of the existence and effect of such delusions.

If the last of these rules had stood alone, and had been so stated that the jury might be presumed to have understood it, and that it was their duty to be guided by it, the proponents' ground of complaint against the charge, which we are at present considering, could be dismissed. But, taking the language which we have quoted as a whole, (and there is nothing elsewhere in the charge which in any manner explains or modifies it,) it is not only possible to see how the jury may have been misled, but it is impossible to see how it could have been otherwise. The statement twice made in different portions of the charge—that "if, when the whole matter is before you, on the evidence given on both sides, it is left uncertain whether or not the testator was of sound mind, then it is left uncertain whether a person of sound mind, within the meaning of our statute, has made the will, and the will should not be sustained"—would, as it appears to us, be likely to impress the jury, and remain in their minds, as the salient feature of the charge. Such a principle, if correct, would have the advantage of being most easy to understand and to apply. The trouble is that it is manifestly incorrect, none the less because it appears to be a quotation from the language of the supreme court of Massachusetts in the case of Crowninshield v. Crowninshield, 2 Gray, 524, 584, and so much so that it would be injustice to the learned judge to believe that he intended it to be understood or believed that it would be understood by the jury literally, strictly, and without qualification, as by the word "equally" before "uncertain," or by the other language which immediately preceded and that which immediately followed it. As it seems to us, nevertheless, that it must have been, on this ground, therefore, it must be held (as further claimed by the proponents) that the charge of the court was erroneous.

But a question of more general interest and importance remains to be considered, in reference to the portion of the charge stating as the rule that the burden of proof as to capacity, by a fair preponderance of evidence, remains in every case, and throughout, upon the proponents of the will. The inquiry is whether this is a correct statement of the law and practice in this state, or, rather, what the correct rule and principle is. In considering this question, an examination at length of the decisions in other jurisdictions would be of little practical utility, for the slightest inspection will disclose an irreconcilable conflict of views and opinions upon the subject. Thus, in 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, 15th ed. § 689, it is said in the text: "In regard to insanity or want of sufficient soundness of mind, we have heretofore seen that though in the probate of a will, as the real issue is whether there is a valid will or not, the executor is considered as holding the affirmative, and therefore may seem bound affirmatively to prove the sanity of the testator, yet we have also seen that the law itself presumes every man to be of sane mind until the contrary is shown. The burden of proving unsoundness or imbecility of mind in the testator is therefore on the party impeaching the will for this cause." While, in a note to the same section, authorities are first given in support of the doctrine stated in the text, then it is said: "It is not so held universally, and the better rule is that the burden of proof, both of the execution and the capacity of the testator, is upon him who attempts to set up the will." Authorities in support of that statement are then given, and the note then ends with these words: "Indeed, the question of the burden of proof in a plea of insanity is one which is variously decided,"—a statement which, satisfactory or not, is doubtless correct. We shall therefore, so far as a consideration of the authorities elsewhere is concerned, content ourselves with saying that while in some of the states the burden of proving want of capacity is held, as stated in the text of Greenleaf, to be, throughout, upon the contestants of a will, in others, and perhaps most, either by virtue of statutes or in accordance with the decisions of the courts of last resort, affirmative proof of sanity is required from the proponents; but that generally speaking, in such jurisdictions, notwithstanding such requirement of affirmative proof of capacity, the general presumption of sanity is held to continue, and that, if the evidence is balanced and so doubtful, such presumption should prevail, (Trish v. Newell, 63 Ill. 196; Carpenter v. Calvert, 88 Ill. 62; Deafield v. Parish, 25 N. Y. 9; Hawkins v. Grimes, 18 B. Mon. 257;) or, as it is held, that, on formal proof of capacity by the attesting witnesses, the burden of the proponents has been discharged, and thereafter rests upon the party alleging incapacity. Sloan v. Macneil, 8 N. J. Eq. 563; Yoe v. McCord, 74 Ill. 88; Mayo v. Jones, 78 N. C. 402; Thompson v. Kyner, 65 Pa. 368; Egbert v. Egbert, 78 Pa. 326; Rich v. Bowker, 25 Kan. 7; Colo's Will, 49 Wis. 179.

Important cases, illustrative of these views, are Perkins v. Perkins, 39 N. H. 168, and Tuff v. Hoemer, 14 Mich. 309. In the former case the court said: "That every man is presumed to be sane is abundantly proved by the authorities. We think that although the subscribing witnesses, if they can be produced, must be examined in relation to the soundness of the testator's mind, yet the party propounding a will for probate is under no general duty to offer any evidence of the testator's sanity, but may safely rely upon the presumption of the law that all men are sane, until some evidence to the contrary is offered." And it was further said that though the burden of proof is upon the party who asserts the validity of the will, and this burden remains upon him until the close of the trial, he need introduce no proof upon this point until something appears to the contrary. In Taff v. Hoerner, supra, Cooley, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The party assuming the burden of establishing a will has not supposed himself bound in his opening, to go further than to give evidence by the subscribing witnesses of these facts, which would make out, prima facie, a valid testamentary instrument, and has left all further evidence on the subject of mental capacity to be brought in by way of answer to that adduced by the contestant. The evidence at the opening has usually been of a formal character, and the proponent has confined himself to inquiries of a general nature respecting the signing and attestation, and whether at the time the party appeared to understand the business in which he was engaged. To prove that the decedent was not insane is to prove that an exceptional state of facts did not exist; in other words, it is to prove a negative, and, on general principles, very slight evidence only should be demanded of the party called upon to prove such a state of facts." See also Banker v. Banker, 63 N. Y. 409; Dean v. Dean, 27 Vt. 746; Turner v. Cook, 36 Ind. 129; Herbert v. Berrier, 81 Ind. 1; Jenkins v. Tobin, 31 Ark. 806; and Stubbs v. Houston, 33 Ala. 555.

The above language of Judge Cooley states very correctly, we think, the existing practice in this state, except, perhaps, as to the form of the inquiry put to attesting witnesses concerning the capacity of the testator; and the views expressed as to the character of evidence of the nonexistence of insanity, pertinent as they are, would be even more so when, as in the case before us, the issue raised was mainly as to the existence in the mind of the alleged testator of an insane delusion on one point only, consistent with general capacity to do business and to manage successfully a large estate, concerning which delusion the court, in its charge, at the request of the contestants, said to the jury: "When the mental disorder is a delusion upon one or a few particular subjects, the testimony of persons with whom he has not had occasion to speak on those subjects is of not so much weight as that of those with whom he had occasion to speak on those subjects,"—a statement the correctness of which, in point of law, counsel for the contestants, in their brief, justify, by saying that the court could have gone further, and charged the jury, in the language of Chief Justice

Denio, in American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 631, that, under such circumstances, "the testimony of persons with whom he has not had occasion to speak on those subjects is of no weight." It ought, we think, to be manifest that, if this be correct, the position of the proponents of a will attacked on the ground of an insane delusion on one or a few particular subjects, existing in the mind of the claimed testator, compelled to bear throughout, and unrelieved by any presumption of sanity, (even, as it would seem, by a presumption that, if the decedent were sane on subjects generally, he was so as to all, until the contrary appeared,) the burden of proving the nonexistence of any form, general or special, of incapacity, which could have affected the provisions of the instrument, (a burden which though negative in its nature, could only be discharged by positive evidence,—the evidence of those who had talked with the testator on subjects which the proponents of the will may claim never entered into his thoughts at all,) if this, we say, be a correct statement of the law, the position of the proponents of a will must be difficult in the extreme.

But it is time that we came to an examination of the Connecticut decisions, and the rule to be deduced from them. In Comstock v. Hadlyme Eccl. Soc., 8 Conn. 254, it was held that, on an appeal from a decree of a court of probate establishing a will, the burden of proof as to the capacity of the testator rests upon the party claiming under such will, who is therefore entitled to go forward on the trial. This decision was approved and affirmed in Knox's App., 26 Conn. 22, and followed in Dale's App., 57 Conn. 182, and Livingston's App., 63 Conn. 74. It is the settled and undoubted law of this state. But this statement does not decide; it is only preliminary to the real question before us: What is the nature, character, and extent of that burden? What does it demand of the proponents? It requires, in the first instance, that one or more of the subscribing witnesses, if alive and within reach of the process of the court, should be called and examined, in reference both to execution and capacity. It is the right of the party contesting the validity of the will to require that all the attesting witnesses so within reach of process should be called, but such right is waived where no demand is made therefor before the final closing of the evidence in the case. Fyfe's App., 36 Conn. 277. The testimony thus adduced is by practice confined to the appearance, conduct, and surroundings of the testator at the time of the execution of the will, and the opinions of the witnesses, based thereon. If such opinions are favorable to the sanity of the testator, then, having thus introduced the subscribing witnesses to these points "by the practice in this state, the proponents rest, and the contestants go forward with their evidence, and the proponents then rebut." Dale's App. and Livingston's App. supra.

Waiving, for the present, the question as to what would be the case, if none of the subscribing witnesses could be procured, or if those called expressed opinions unfavorable to the capacity of the decedent, and assuming the due testimony of such witnesses to capacity, as well as execution, what, then, becomes of the burden of proof, now that the prima facie case has been made out, and the proponents have rested? In the case of Comstock v. Hadlyme Eccl. Soc., supra, Brooks v. Barrett, 7 Pick. 94, was referred to as authority. That case was indeed practically overruled in Massachusetts by Crowninshield v. Crowninshield, 2 Gray, 524. But, notwithstanding that fact, some years after the later decision, our court, in Knox's App., supra, again referred with approval to Brooks v. Barrett, saying that it was there held "that, where a will is opposed on the ground of the testator's insanity when it was executed, those who insist on its probate have the burden of proof in the first instance, and, after they have proved the sanity of the testator by the subscribing witnesses, the burden will be shifted on the other party to prove insanity." And the court also cite Gilley v. Gilley, 84 Me. 162, and Gerrish v. Nason, 22 Me. 438, 39 Am. Dec. 589, to the same effect. That this, in effect, however best expressed, is the law of Connecticut, has, we think, been the general understanding of the profession ever since Knox's App. As an illustration, it may be observed that in Dale's App., supra, counsel for the contestants of Mrs. Munson's will (not the proponents) requested the court (see page 180, 57 Conn.) to charge the jury that "in ordinary cases, if the attesting witnesses to a will all agree in the opinion that the will was duly made and executed, it throws the burden of proving affirmatively the exercise of undue influence or want of testamentary capacity on the heirs who may contest the will," claiming, however, that the case then on trial was exceptional. The trial court, although not charging in the language requested, apparently had the same view, and expressed it by twice using the language quoted by this court in Knox's App., supra, from Brooks v. Barrett, supra,—that the burden of proof was upon the proponents "in the first instance," and the charge was approved by this court. And the same view appears to be clearly held in Livingston's App., 63 Conn. 75. Opposed to this form of expression, however, as to the shifting of the burden of proof during the trial of a case, are the dicta, in this state and elsewhere, that the burden of proof never shifts; that it remains on a party whose duty it primarily is to prove a fact in support of his case, and does not change in any aspect of his cause; that while the weight of evidence may shift from side to side, in the progress of a trial, according to the nature and strength of the proofs offered in support or denial of the main fact to be established, the burden continues where it was at the outset. The term "burden of proof" is, after all, and no matter how important it has become through universal adoption and use, a mere form or figure of speech. Accordingly, as one view or another of its significance has been held, one style or the other of these seemingly inconsistent expressions has been used to denote entirely consistent meanings. What we are now concerned to do is to discover, if we can, and to express as clearly as we can, the true underlying principle and rule; that is to say, the law of this jurisdiction in relation to the matter in question.

Assuming, then, as the better form of statement, in accordance with modern phraseology, that the burden of proof does not shift, and that such burden is placed primarily, in reference to sanity, on the proponents of a will, what duty is thereby imposed? The statute provides that all persons of a certain age and of sound mind may make wills. It is therefore incumbent on the proponents to prove that the alleged testator was of sound mind. But the law presumes every person to be so until the contrary is shown, and this presumption is of probative force in favor of the proponents of the will. It would be sufficient, in the first instance, were it not that, for reasons clearly indicated in the opinions in Knox's App., and Field's App., supra, the practice has grown up and become law of requiring the presence in court of such of the attesting witnesses as are within reach of the process of the court, and evidence from some or all of them in reference to capacity. They are the persons who the law, in its wisdom, has provided should be placed about the testator at the time and place of the execution of the will, in order that they may have means and opportunity of judging of his capacity, and may protect both the testator and the heirs. It is for this reason, as this court explicitly said in Field's App., supra, that the heirs have a right to insist that the triers shall have the benefit of the observation and opinions of all the witnesses, if practicable, and that the party seeking to establish the will shall, unless the requirement is waived, put them on the stand. The making of a will, said this court in Knox's App., "is of so much importance, and it is so often, not to say, so generally, done under circumstances of great bodily debility, likely to produce more or less mental derangement, that the statute has very properly required three witnesses." Having required them, it is as natural to hold that they should be called, or their absence legally accounted for. Failure to do this would raise a natural inference against the validity of the will, which would properly go very far to overcome the presumption of law in its favor. So, also, it may be said, that if, when called, they fail, by their evidence, to support the capacity of the testator, so far as the facts related by them, as existing at the time, and their opinions based on those facts are concerned, it may well be claimed that they disprove the presumption of sanity and necessitate the production of other evidence of capacity before the proponents can rest as having established and made out a prima facie case. But when the evidence of the attesting witnesses has been produced, and is in favor of the proponents, and they have thereupon rested, what has been made out? What is embraced in the prima facie case thus presented? Two things, certainly, as it seems to us,—that the testator generally was of sound and disposing mind and memory, as established by the presumption of sanity; and that there was nothing in the surrounding circumstances, at the time of the execution of the instrument, suspicious in its character, or calculated to affect or weaken such presumption. In other words, the testator was to be presumed sane until the contrary appeared, and the contrary did not appear at the time of the execution of the instrument and to those who witnessed it. This would be the necessary force of the evidence. It would, perhaps, be all its force if the witnesses called in were strangers to the testator, and had no other opportunity than the brief act of signing afforded to judge of his condition or state of mind. It might, however, have an additional weight if the acquaintance or means of observation were greater or more extended. Whatever weight it had, the proponents would be entitled to upon the whole case, but the essential elements of the prima facie case would be as we have indicated. Now, the proponents having presented their prima facie case, and rested, the contestants, as was said in Dale's App., supra, would go forward with their evidence, and the proponents then rebut. When the case was closed upon the evidence, what would be the situation of the parties? The burden of proof as to the capacity would remain upon the proponents. In their favor, in the discharge of that burden, would be the presumption of sanity, valid until overcome by opposing proof. Against it would be the evidence offered as to incapacity by the contestants. If it was evidence as to general incapacity, covering, perhaps, as this court said in Dale's App., 57 Conn. 143, "long spaces of time in either direction," it would have been met with more or less success by counter evidence of the same character; if of delusions on one or more particular subjects, consistent with the general appearance of sanity and capacity, it would have been met, as such evidence alone could be met, either by disproving or discrediting the instances claimed, or by rendering their existence or influence upon the provisions of the will improbable, by other instances, circumstances, and conduct of an inconsistent character. In short, as was so clearly stated in the citation made from the opinion of Judge Cooley in Taff v. Hoemer, 14 Mich. 809, the evidence of the contestants would be offensive and affirmative in its character, and that of the proponents defensive and negative, and on the whole case the question would be whether the evidence of the contestants sufficiently preponderated over the rebuttal and special evidence of the proponents, including the evidence of the attesting witnesses, to overcome the presumption of sanity, which constituted the proponents' prima facie case. In other words, leaving the presumption of sanity out of the case, was there more evidence of insanity than of sanity, so that, putting it again into the case, there would still be as much? Then, and then only, would the scales of justice, to which the court below, in the case before us, referred, be so adjusted, according to law, that it would be correct to say: "Unless, at the close of the trial, the balance is with the advocates of the will, they must fail. It is not sufficient that the scales stand evenly balanced." This consideration of the presumption of sanity in favor of the proponents' case the court below, while holding them to a strict discharge of the burden of proof, failed in any form to recognize, and therefore, in this particular also, we must hold that there was error in the charge.

In addition to the reasons of appeal based upon the charge of the court to the jury, there are other reasons which remain to be considered. It is claimed that the court erred in admitting a hypothetical question addressed to Dr. Stearns, an expert witness for the contestants, against the proponents' objection. The hypothetical question is contained in the record, covering three printed pages. Fortunately, we deem it unnecessary to quote it at length. It is only requisite to refer to some of the matters contained in it which appear to us improper elements to enter into such a question. Among the matters which the witness was asked to assume to be true were that many different persons, after conversing with the testator and observing his conduct, believed him to be insane. We do not think such a belief of many others, presumably not experts, and opposed, as it doubtless was, by the contrary belief of many others, constituted a legitimate element of the basis of the opinion of the witness. By deciding upon that ground, he would not only assume the function of the triers, but would go further, since they could only consider such opinions in connection with the facts on which they were based; while the witness had in reference to such opinions no facts, except that the many persons formed such opinions after conversing with the testator and observing his conduct. But there was no statement of the conversation or description of the conduct. Of course, we do not mean to intimate that, if these had been added, the fault would thereby have been obviated.

Again, another assumption was that "neighbors and friends, who observed his conduct, advised his wife that it was unsafe for her to remain there alone, and that she had better send for her father to come and stay with her; and she did so, and he remained over night," which is perhaps more clearly improper in such a question, if anything can be, than the other.

Again, "that he afterwards made a will, leaving his daughter, whom he named by name, such an inconsiderable amount of his property, although his estate was inventoried after his death at more than $100,000, as to practically disinherit her, and making like provision in his will for his after-born children, which practically disinherited them." In reference to this last quotation, if what the contestants stated in the argument before us is correct,—that the clear estate of the testator would not amount to more than half its inventory value,—the statement of that, rather than the true value, was the substitution of an immaterial for a more material element, and it is to be noticed that the amount left to the child, and also the provision for after-born children, is not stated, but the omission is supplied by the assumption and inference of the counsel propounding the question that they were "inconsiderable," and amounted to "practical disinheritation,"—very indefinite expressions, calculated to produce very definite impressions.

And, finally, after three pages of statements, assumed facts, and inferences, the question concludes thus: "That the jury find the evidence of the physician Dr. Whiton, which you have heard, to be true." Witness: "I heard that part of it." "Assuming that the testimony of Dr. Whiton, in connection with those other propositions and facts I have named, were true, and that the jury find them to be true, can you form an opinion whether the testator was of sound and disposing mind at the time of making his will?" Now, what the evidence of Dr. Whiton does not appear. Whether it would have been admissible to have asked Dr. Stearns simply if he had heard the testimony of Dr. Whiton, and if so, then, assuming it to be true, what was his opinion, we need not consider, except to say that if Dr. Whiton testified as an expert or as to matters of opinion, so that the question called for an opinion from Dr. Stearns, based on the opinion of Dr. Whiton, it clearly would not be. But, supposing the evidence of Dr. Whiton had been in regard to facts, as distinguished from opinions, even then, although the cases in other states are in considerable conflict, we think the weight of authority is that the assumed facts must be included in the question. Our own court, indeed, seems to sanction the idea of some discretion in the matter on the part of the presiding judge, in Roraback v. Pennsylvania Co., 58 Conn. 292, but the language used clearly denotes that such discretion is limited, and must be sparingly employed. The court said: "But, as there may be cases in which no harm could be done by permitting questions which are to be answered by the opinion of the witness to be asked without such enunciation, we think it may fairly be left to the discretion of the presiding judge to prescribe the form in which such questions must be asked whenever it is necessary to do so." But where, as in the question before us, a very great number of particulars are "enunciated," many more than any witness of normal capacity could be presumed to remember and keep distinctly in mind, the putting into such a question, bodily, the evidence of another witness, to be considered "in connection with those other facts and propositions named," is clearly objectionable on its face, and receives no justification or excuse from any possible "necessity." It is impossible for those interested in the answer to know the result of the mental process by which the witness made the required connection, what portions of the evidence of Dr. Whiton he thus used, and in what way and to what extent it contributed to the result reached,—the answer given.

It is also a complaint of the proponents that the question, as a whole, was objectionable and misleading, because it "states the existence of certain conditions, and the happening of diverse incidents, (all for the purpose of determining the sanity of a man at a given moment,) without any statement as to their relation to one another, in point of time or otherwise; that is to say, without assuming any period of time for the happening of such incidents, and without giving, the witness any right to assume such a fact, leaving him to believe that he may base his opinion on their having happened contemporaneously or in close continuous succession." There is certainly some apparent ground for this criticism also, though the record does not enable us to determine how nearly the belief of the witness as to the "close connection" would accord with the evidence on which the contestants claimed to base their hypothetical question; and we think that all we are required to say in reference to this objection is that in this particular, as in all others, a question to an expert witness, testifying as to a person's mental condition, about which he has no personal knowledge, should contain such assumptions of facts, and such only, as counsel may fairly claim that the evidence in the case tends to justify, and that, while such a question may not be improper because it included only a part of the facts in evidence, it would be so if, by reason of omission, it manifestly failed to present facts which it did include in their just and true relation, and caused them to appear in one that was untrue and unjust.

It was claimed by the contestants that, even if the question was objectionable, this reason of appeal of the proponents could not be supported; and this on three grounds: First. That the objection taken was in these words: "I desire to object to the question, upon the ground that it does not state truly what the evidence in the case shows." That this was saying merely that the question did not state the facts as they existed, which was not required by the rule; citing Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 470, 88 Am. Rep. 464. Second. That, the court having permitted the witness, against the proponents' objection, to answer the question, the record does not show that any exception was taken to the ruling of the court. Third. That the answering the question, as framed, could have done the proponents no harm. That it was one thing to inquire of the doctor as to the sufficiency of the data for an opinion, and quite another to ask him for his opinion as to the testator's actual mental condition at a given time. Upon the facts and propositions contained in the question, it seems to us that it was the duty of the proponents to have pointed out in a more specific manner, to the court, the particulars in which the proposed hypothetical question was objectionable; and, under the circumstances, we do not think the court committed an error by admitting the question for which a new trial should be allowed. But, as such new trial must be granted for reasons before given, we have stated our views, for the guidance of the parties upon such trial, and for the information of all who may be interested or concerned in the question.

As explaining the basis of the three remaining reasons of appeal, we quote the following from the record: "The proponents offered in evidence, for the purpose of showing the mental capacity of the testator, the diaries of the deceased from 1885 to 1891, inclusive, which were admitted and read in detail to the jury, consuming several days in such reading. Afterwards, during the trial, they further offered the entries in said diaries as memoranda and declarations of the testator, for the purpose of proving such entries to be true in fact. Upon objection of contestants' counsel, the court limited the diaries and entries therein to the purpose for which they were originally introduced and admitted, and proponents excepted. During the trial, proponents offered a letter book of the deceased, containing what were claimed to be copies of letters written by the deceased to various persons; and such letter book was read entire to the jury, occupying two or three days in reading it, for the purpose of showing the mental soundness of the testator. After the book had been offered in evidence and read to the jury, the proponents offered in evidence a large bundle of letters, claimed by them to have been found by Mr. Barber's executor, among his effects, after his death, and to have been written to Mr. Barber by one or more correspondents, and which, as claimed by proponents' counsel, were either answers to the letters, copies of which appeared in the letter book, or suggested the writing of the letters therein contained. Counsel for the proponents stated at the time of offering such bundle of letters that he did not propose to read them, but merely to put them in without any proof of the authenticity of the letters, or their having been received by the testator in the regular course of business, or presenting the authors of said letters in court for examination. Upon the envelopes containing the letters, and upon the outside of the letters not inclosed in the envelopes, were pencil memoranda, purporting to have been placed there by Mr. Barber, and which were identified as in his hand-writing, and purporting to be memoranda of the dates of the letters. To the admission of said letters, under the offer of the proponents, the contestants' counsel objected. The court thereupon allowed the memoranda upon the outside of the envelopes and letters made thereon by Mr. Barber to go to the jury, but ruled out the contents of the letters themselves. Contestants excepted to the ruling of the court. "The contestants introduced one Parker, who testified that the testator was, in his opinion, of unsound mind, and, among other things, testified to a business transaction with Mr. Barber, in which Mr. Parker sold the testator a quantity of tobacco stems, which the testator refused to pay for, for the reason that the wind had blown the tobacco stems off the land on which they had been placed for fertilizing, and they therefore had done him no good. To contradict Mr. Parker, the proponents offered a receipt for tobacco stems, signed by Mr. Parker, and found among Mr. Barber's effects, and also offered an account book purporting to have been kept by the testator, containing an entry of cash, purporting to have been paid to Mr. Parker for tobacco stems. Mr. Parker, having been called as a witness by the proponents, and shown the receipt, denied that the receipt was for the stems which he had already testified to as having been sold by him to Mr. Barber, but related to another and entirely different transaction which had taken place at an entirely different time, the item in the account book corresponding with the item in the receipt. The receipt was admitted in evidence for what it was worth, but counsel for the contestants objected to the introduction of the account book for the purpose for which it was offered, to wit, to contradict Mr. Parker, and show that the account of the tobacco stems was in fact paid. The court sustained the objection, and the proponents excepted to the ruling."

That, as a matter of common law and unaffected by statute, the ruling of the court in reference to the diaries, admitting them for the purpose of showing the mental capacity of the testator, but not for the purpose of proving the entries to be true in fact, was correct, there can, we think, be no question whatever. The American cases on this subject are almost numberless, and, so far as we are aware, in entire accord in affirmance of this view. A large collection of such cases may be found in a note on page 156, 11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law. But we need go no further for authority on this point than our own case of Comstock v. Hadlyme Eccl. Soc. 8 Conn. 254, 20 Am. Dec. 100. The real contention of the proponents, however, appears to be, that such entries are now admissible in this state as evidence of the truth of relevant matters therein contained, by virtue of the statute, (Gen. Stat. § 1094,) on the ground that an appeal from a probate decree, approving or disapproving an alleged will, is "an action by or against the representatives of a deceased person," within the meaning of that statute; and the case of Pixley v. Eddy, 56 Conn. 388, is cited as authority to that effect. In what case this court held that a distributee of the property of a deceased person is his "representative," within the meaning of section 1094, and without the aid of section 1095, in a suit involving title to property. But we fail to see how this case reflects any light upon the present question. In the present case there can be no doubt that the proponents of the will are "representatives" of the deceased. The inquiry turns upon whether such an appeal is an "action" by or against such representatives, within the meaning of that provision. That such appeal is an "action," within the intent of some statutory provisions, (Gen. Stat. § 794,) is certain. But this is not an ordinary case, and has never been treated as such in this state, but as a statutory and special proceeding." Livingston's Appeal, supra. In reference, then, to such a proceeding, was it the intention of the legislature, by the provisions of the statute in question, to change the existing common law in regard to the entries and memoranda of alleged testators? It seems to us not, and that the case of Bissell v. Beckwith, 32 Conn. 509, and the opinion of this court by Baldwin, J., in the recent and still unreported case of Rowland v. Railroad Co., abundantly show—First, that the statute should be "construed according to the apparent intention of the legislature, to be gathered from the entire language used, in connection with the subject and purpose of the law;" and second, that such construction will not bring such appeal as the present within its purview. There was no error, therefore, in the ruling of the court below on this point.

Whether any distinction is to be drawn between the diary entries and the entry in the account book of cash purporting to have been paid to Mr. Parker for tobacco stems, it is not necessary to decide; for, even granting such entry to have been admissible, its exclusion could have produced no possible injury to the proponents. The receipt admitted, signed by Mr. Parker, corresponded with the item in the account book, and furnished the best and fully conclusive evidence of payment, which payment was not denied; the claim of Mr. Parker being that it was a different transaction from the one concerning which he had previously testified. On this point, corroborating evidence of the admitted fact of payment would have been of no materiality.

So far as the letters are concerned, the only exception, as shown by the record, was taken, not by the proponents, but by the contestants. But even if we were to assume, as we have no right to do, but as was most earnestly asserted by the proponents, that an exception was also taken by them, we think the proposition to lay these letters in as a mass, unread, for the jury "to examine or not, as they should feel inclined," was improper. Billings' App., 49 Conn. 456, 459. We ought, however, perhaps, to add, in view of what may probably arise upon another trial of this case, that if (as the record affords us some warrant for believing) the court refused to admit these letters because unaccompanied with proof of authenticity or that they were received in the regular course of business, and because their authors were not produced for examination, such grounds of refusal, upon the facts stated, do not seem to us valid. The finding of the letters among the papers of Mr. Barber, by his executor, with pencil memoranda upon them of the dates, in Mr. Barber's hand-writing, would appear to be sufficient evidence, prima facie, that they were what they purported to be; especially where the question was not as to the truth of any matters stated therein, or as to the authenticity of the letters, but as to the evidence of capacity which the testator's replies afforded, which could best be apprehended by knowing the contents of the writings themselves, which the testator's letters purported to answer.

There was error in the charge of the court to the jury, as hereinbefore indicated, and for this reason a new trial is granted.

The other Judges concurred.

A prothonotary and his sureties in Pennsylvania are liable for damages incurred through a mistake in the certificate furnished to the purchaser of land by the prothonotary as to judgments, as it is part of his duty, incident to his office as keeper of the record, the fee bill giving him compensation for searches and certificates; and he is the only person that the common law of the state recognizes for that purpose, and the omission of his seal will not relieve his sureties. *Ziegler v. The fact that the borrower knew of the existence of the omitted liens, and acted as the agent of the loaner in ordering the recorder to make the certificate, will not relieve the recorder in Pennsylvania from liability to a party loaning money for errors and omissions in a certificate of search. Houseman v. Girard Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. 81 Pa. 256, 2 W. N. C. 573, 33 Phila. Leg. Int. 103.

So a recorder of deeds is liable to a building association for omitting from his certificate of title mention of a mortgage on the representation of the party applying for the abstract to be used by the building association that the mortgages should be satisfied, where the solicitor of the association allowed the applicant for the loan to procure the searches. Peabody Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Houseman, 89 Pa. 261, 33 Am. Rep. 757.

The court determines that it is the duty of the recorder as the law gives him a fee for the certifichanties' liens, or foreign executions on file or of record in this county, or any attachments or other suits pending in said county, against said within-described lands nor against any of the grantors or grantees herein, nor against any other person through whom title herein is derived, except — D. M. Ferguson, Clerk District Court, Miami Co., Kansas. Dated this 8th day of April, 1885. [Seal.]"—and receives therefor twenty-five cents, which is the fee allowed by law for a certificate alone, it will not be presumed, in the absence of evidence, that such clerk agreed to make a careful search, and correctly certify as to the condition of the title to such land, but the burden of showing an express agreement to do so rests on the plaintiff; and such clerk will not be held liable for any mere errors of judgment, or want of skill, in determining the legal effect of a suit pending in the court of which he is clerk. A party relying on the certificate of such clerk, in the absence of such agreement, must himself bear whatever loss ensues from want of skill or honest errors of judgment on the part of such clerk.

3. Whatever liability is incurred in any case by such clerk is to the person for whom the certificate is made, and not to his gran-date and the condition of his bond was "shall and does well and truly and faithfully, in all things, execute and perform the duties of the said office."

Where the borrower of money furnished a certificate of search and the agent of the lender, being dissatisfied with it, went to the prothonotary and asked for a renewed search, and he reaffirmed its correctness, he is liable on his bond to the party loaning money for damages caused by judgments omitted from the abstract. Siewers v. Com. 87 Pa. 15.

Under Pennsylvania Act 1872, § 1 (Pub. Laws, 1140) the recorder of deeds, prothonotaries, clerks of courts, and other officers in the city of Philadelphia whose duty or custom it is or hereafter may be to make and certify searches, shall be liable on their bond to any person claiming under the party for whom the abstract was furnished for five years from the time of certificate of search.

The recorder and sureties are not liable for omitting a mortgage from his certificate of search if the mortgagor's name is not correctly given in the order for the search. Com. v. Owen, 2 W. N. C. 200.

A register of deeds is liable to the party employing him in damages for negligence in omitting from an abstract mention of an incumbrance, which omission caused expense to the plaintiff in perfecting the title. Smith v. Holmes, 54 Mich. 104.

This is on the ground that he entered into a contract to examine the records and report as to what mortgages were on the land and the law implied an undertaking from him that he possessed the required knowledge and skill; and that he would use due and ordinary care and if the plaintiff was damaged by failure she could recover.

A recorder in Illinois is not bound to examine and give information whether land is incumbered as it would frequently involve a question as to the legal effect of the conveyances of record, but he is bound to search and give information of the fact whether there are deeds, mortgages, or writings concerning the land. He is allowed for every search of record twelve and one half cents, under Gales' Ill. Stat., 299, and the fees and perquisites of office are sufficient considerations to charge the surety on his bond for breach of duty in giving incorrect information as to instruments on record. Lusk v. Carlin, 5 Ill. 395.

This supports the main case as to the province of an officer in respect to the legal effect of the conveyances of record; but it seems that the statutory fee for search implies a duty to search. This statutory provision is wanting in Kansas.

In an action against the clerk of the district court for damages for certificate of title, a demurrer to the petition should be sustained where it shows that the plaintiff was not damaged but had title before an alleged mechanics' lien was filed, which it was claimed was omitted from the abstract. United States Wind Engine & P. Co. v. Linville, 43 Kan. 455.

A petition against a clerk in the office of recorder, and deputy recorder of a county for damages in making an erroneous abstract of title which plaintiff desired to purchase, and which abstract was incorrect, and plaintiff was required to pay off an undisclosed judgment, is bad on demurrer for failing to allege that plaintiff purchased the property. Batty v. Fout, 54 Ind. 432.

There is no statute making it the duty of the recorder in Indiana to search the records and certify to the condition of titles. "If, for a consideration, he undertakes to search the record and certify to titles, and whether certain real estate is incumbered or not, he would be liable upon such undertaking just as would any other person; he would be liable to the party who employed him, but not to such as might simply see and rely upon such certificate." Mechanics Bldg. Asso. v. Whitacre, 93 Ind. 547.

Under N. Y. Sess. Laws 1853, p. 265, providing that the county clerk shall cause search to be made in his office and shall be liable for all damages from errors, inaccuracies, or mistakes in his return, a county clerk who was employed by plaintiff to make an abstract so that plaintiff could procure a loan on land he already owned, but who omitted a judgment against a prior owner which afterwards cost plaintiff $400 to settle, is not liable in damages since the loss did not occur from the error in the abstract. Kimball v. Connolly, 38 How. Pr. 247.

The defendant is liable for negligence where he was employed by an intended purchaser, to make a search for taxes and assessment and gave the plaintiff two returns one being a search for taxes certified to by him, and the other a search for assessments certified by some other party not employed by plaintiff and which omitted an assessment which had to be paid after the purchase, and the purchase was made relying on these certificates. Morange v. Mix, 44 N. Y. 315.

It does not appear whether the party employed to search was an officer or not. If the defendant intended that plaintiff should rely on the certificate made by the other party he is liable for the negligence of such other party as though he had made it himself.

A register of deeds who gave a false certificate that a title was unincumbered, when he knew there was an attachment thereon, was guilty of misconduct in office and could be removed from office, although it was not part of his official duty to certify as to titles. State v. Leach, 80 Me. 58, 11 Am. Rep. 172.

In connection with the main case it should be noticed, that under Taylor's Kan. Stat., 1147, an abstractor of titles must give good bond in the sum of $5,000, and shall be liable thereon to any person for whom he may compile an abstract for any damage for incompleteness or errors, that the filing of the bond is a guaranty of good faith. This shows that the business is regarded by the legislature of that state as distinct from the duties of the clerk.

In this note the liability of attorneys and other private abstractors for opinion or certificate of title or abstracts furnished by them is omitted.

tee; and, before the plaintiff can recover, he must show that he employed the defendant to perform the service.

4. The defendant in this case made, on an abstract of title, the certificate above mentioned, and received twenty-five cents therefor. There was a suit pending, affecting the title to the lands described in the abstract, which was prosecuted to judgment, and resulted in loss to the plaintiff. The defendant was not a lawyer, nor an abstractor, nor did he claim to have any skill in making searches of records, but erroneously supposed it was his duty to make such certificate. There is no claim that he acted in bad faith or corruptly, but, under the findings of the court, appears to have used such care and judgment as he was ordinarily capable of exercising. Held, that the defendant is not liable in this action.

ERROR to the District Court for Miami County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for losses sustained by reason of defects in the abstract of title to certain land, which was certified by defendant and upon which plaintiff relied in purchasing the property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John C. Sheridan, for plaintiff in error:

Having engaged in the business of examining titles and furnishing abstracts thereof, for which he receives compensation, the defendant impliedly represents himself to the public as one competent to conduct it, and that he will at least use ordinary care and diligence in the discharge of it.

In some of the states it is the practice for the examiner after having ascertained the chain of title by inspection of the records, to direct written requisitions to the clerks of the various offices for searches for incumbrances or liens of record that may affect the property. In large cities this method is rendered necessary, or at least convenient, in order to avoid the throng of applicants which would otherwise crowd the offices, and also to prevent subjection of the records to the carelessness or fraudulent designs of the searchers. The liability of all such officers is either fixed by statute, or is established under the general law of negligence. They are also liable for the acts or omissions of those whom they delegate to do the work.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant damages which she claims to have sustained by reason of the defendant having certified on the abstract title to a certain lot in Paola, as follows: "I hereby certify that there are no judgments, mechanics' liens, foreign executions, or suits pending on the records of this court against any of the above-named grantors or grantees affecting the title of the above-described real estate, except as above stated. Dated this 8th day of April, 1885. D. M. Ferguson, Clerk of the District Court Miami Co., Kas." Plaintiff alleges, in substance, that, relying upon this certificate, she purchased the property described in the abstract, and paid therefor, in cash, the sum of $5,000; that, in truth and in fact, there was a suit then pending in said district court wherein one Sutton S. Clover was plaintiff, and William G. Oakman, Hattie E. Oakman, and others were defendants, in which said Clover claimed to own an equitable interest in said lands, and sought to recover the same. Plaintiff further alleges that said suit last mentioned was tried in said district court, and that said Clover was by said court adjudged to be the owner of the undivided one fourth of said property; that plaintiff was compelled to pay $1,000 to buy in the interests of said Clover, and that she paid attorney fees and expenses in defending said action to the amount of $385; that she had demanded payment from the defendant, and that he refused. The defendant admits that he was clerk of the district court, and that he signed the certificate set up in the petition. The defendant denied that he was engaged in the business of making abstracts. The defendant alleges that said abstract was made by one C. W. Chandler, who was engaged in the business of making abstracts of title, and that said defendant signed the same as an accommodation to the said Chandler. He alleges that, before signing the certificate, he made a diligent, thorough, and careful examination of the records in his office, and, as a result of said search and examination, was satisfied of the truth of said certificate. He alleges that he examined all the records and papers in said suit of Clover v. Oakman, and was convinced that the title to said real estate was not involved in said suit of Clover v. Oakman. The defendant also alleges that the party for whom said abstract was made was unknown to him at the time he signed said certificate, and that he signed it for the sole advantage and profit of said C. W. Chandler. The undisputed evidence shows that the defendant was paid twenty-five cents for this certificate. It also shows that the title to the land mentioned in the abstract was in dispute in said suit of Clover v. Oakman; that Clover obtained judgment for a one-fourth interest therein; that the plaintiff bought in said interest, and paid $1,000 for it; and that she paid attorneys' fees amounting to $310 in defending against the claim of said Clover in that action, she having been made party defendant to the action subsequent to the purchase from Oakman and wife of the property described in the abstract. This case was tried before the court without a jury, and a general finding made in favor of the defendant, and judgment rendered against the plaintiff for costs.

There is no showing that Mrs. Mallory, the plaintiff, or her husband, C. H. Mallory, whom the evidence shows was her general agent in making the purchase of the property, had any conversation directly with the defendant. The evidence does show that Mallory employed said C. W. Chandler to make the abstract. It also shows that Mallory paid to Chandler fifty cents, in addition to 22 L. R. A.

Chandler's own charges, for the certificates of the clerk of the district court and the treasurer. The defendant claims that his understanding of the matter was that the abstract was made for Oakman, and upon this question the testimony is not entirely clear. On cross-examination C. H. Mallory was asked this question: "Question. You may state if you recognize that paper you examine there, (handing witness paper,) and didn't you answer, in reply to that question, this: 'That is the abstract that Mr. Oakman presented to us, made by Mr. Chandler?'" Answer. Well, that was part of the papers; yes, sir." C. W. Chandler, on cross-examination, testified as follows: "Q. What did Mr. Mallory say to you about what he wanted that abstract of title for? A. When he first came to the office he said he wanted it for Mr. Oakman,—that is, Mr. Oakman wanted the abstract—and he spoke to us for it. Q. You told him you would not make the abstract for Mr. Oakman unless Mr. Mallory would pay for it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then he told you to go on and make it, and he would pay for it? A. Yes, sir; he said he would see it was paid for. Q. Then you went on and made it? A. I did." The defendant testified, among other things: "Q. Did Mr. Mallory ever say anything to you in connection with the matter? A. I don't recollect Mr. Mallory saying anything. Q. Did he ever have anything to say to you on the subject? A. No, sir. Q. You say you signed this certificate at the request of Mr. Chandler? A. Yes, sir; C. W. Chandler. I examined the record for Mr. Chandler, at his request. Q. What was Mr. Chandler's business at that time? A. He was in the loan business and the abstract business. Q. Before you signed that certificate at that time, you may state whether you made a careful examination of the records. A. I did make a careful examination of the records. Q. And you may state what, if any, conclusion you came to with reference to anything in that suit affecting the title to that property,—the property alleged to be described in that so-called abstract of title. A. My opinion, according to the best of my judgment, was that it did not affect the title. Of course, it was a complicated case. It was my understanding I was simply to exercise my judgment, as best I could." And again: "Q. Was there any talk in your office, at the time this certificate was certified to, as to who was the owner of this property, or as to whom this abstract was for? A. I understood Mr. Chandler to say he was making it for Mr. Oakman, through Mr. Mallory, at the request of Mr. Mallory; that Mr. Mallory was going to purchase the property. Q. There was something said about Mr. Mallory in connection with it? A. In the talk that Mr. Mallory was going to purchase."

The evidence shows that the defendant frequently made similar certificates on abstracts, for which he charged and received the uniform fee of twenty-five cents. He testifies, however, that he frequently made such certificates without receiving any fee therefor. There is no pretence on the part of the plaintiff that the defendant was either an attorney at law, or engaged in the business of making abstracts of title, except so far as such certificates relate to an abstract. There was no special contract or agreement with reference to this particular certificate, but it was made by the defendant, as he claims, with the understanding on his part that it was his official duty to make such certificates, and that the law allowed him a fee of twenty-five cents therefor. It is important to determine—First, whether there was any undertaking on the part of the defendant to perform any services whatever for the plaintiff in this case; second, if there was such undertaking, what services did the plaintiff undertake to perform? There having been a general finding by the trial court in favor of the defendant, all doubts as to the weight of the evidence must be resolved in his favor.

We are not prepared to say that the uncontradicted evidence shows that the defendant was employed by Mrs. Mallory, through her agent, to make this certificate; and, if we were forced to decide this case on this point alone, we should have to hold that the general finding of the trial court in favor of the defendant included a finding that the defendant was not employed by the plaintiff to make the certificate. We do not, however, rest our decision on this point alone, but will consider the second proposition also. If the making of the certificate on the abstract was not done under an employment from the plaintiff, can she recover in this case? We think the great weight of authority is to the effect that the party making the examination and certificate is liable only to his employer, and never to a stranger or third party. Hughes v. Dundee Mortg. & T. Invest. Co. 21 Fed. Rep. 169. In the case of Houssman v. Girard Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. 81 Pa. 262, Mr. Justice Sharswood, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It was decided by the present chief justice at nisi prius, in the case of Com. v. Harmer, 6 Phila. 90, that this liability is to the party who asks and pays for the search, and does not extend to his assignee or alienee." The decision in the case of Peabody Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Houssman, 89 Pa. 261, 83 Am. Rep. 757, seems to be somewhat in conflict with the doctrine as stated by Justice Sharswood in the case above cited. We think that the rule as stated is sustained both by the weight of reason and authority,—that there must be privity of contract to create liability. In the case of National Sav. Bank of D. C. v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. ed. 621, the Supreme Court of the United States holds: "Where A., an attorney at law employed and paid solely by B. to examine and report on the title of the latter to a certain lot of ground, gave, over his signature, this certificate, 'B's title to the lot [describing it] is good, and the property unincumbered,' C., with whom A. had no contract or communication, relied upon this certificate as true, and loaned money to B., upon the latter executing, by way of security therefor, a deed of trust for the lot; B., before employing A., had transferred the lot in fee by a duly recorded conveyance,—a fact which A., on examining the records, could have ascertained, had he exercised a reasonable degree of care; the money loaned was not paid, and B. is insolvent,—held: First, that there being neither fraud, collusion, nor falsehood by A., nor privity of contract between him and C., he is not liable to the latter for any loss sustained by reason of the certificate; second, that usage cannot make a contract where none was made by the parties."

We think that the judgment of the district court might be upheld on the ground that there was evidence tending to show that the employment of the defendant was made in behalf of a person other than the plaintiff. We shall proceed, however, with the consideration of the more important question involved in the case,—whether, conceding the existence of such employment by the plaintiff, the nature of the employment renders the defendant liable in this action. The defendant was clerk of the district court of Miami county, Kan. He testifies that in making this certificate he supposed he was merely performing a duty imposed on him by law. It is nowhere made the duty of the clerk of the district court to search the records in his office for judgments, liens, and suits pending, nor does the statute provide any fee for any such service. It is not contended in this case that there was any special contract or agreement between the parties as to the particular service he was to perform; but it is contended on the part of the plaintiff that the defendant was in the habit of making such certificates for pay,—for the uniform fee of twenty-five cents,—and that because of such practice he was liable for any error in such certificate. The law does allow the clerk of the district court a fee of twenty-five cents for his certificate and seal. Can it be said that because the defendant was in the habit of making certificates of the character of this one, and charging therefor the sum of twenty-five cents, he is liable for any error or misstatement contained therein? Ordinarily the certificate of the clerk of the district court is attached to copies of records or to other written instruments, for which, if made by the clerk himself, he is also entitled to payment. If the defendant had been called upon to make a full transcript of all the records in the case of Clover v. Oakman, over his certificate of the correctness thereof, and had he made what purported to be such transcript, to the correctness of which he appended his certificate, we do not doubt that he would have been liable for any error or omission in the transcript, through which the party receiving and paying therefor was injured. In this case, however, the clerk certifies, not to the correctness of a transcript which he has made, but to the legal effect of the whole volume of all the records in his office on the title to this land.

Authorities are cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error, which, he contends, hold the defendant liable. These authorities must be considered with reference to the statutes which were construed by the courts in making their decisions. In the case of Ziegler v. Com., the court says: "In Pennsylvania it has ever been a portion of the duty of the prothonotary to make searches. It is an incident of his office as a keeper of the records of the county. The fee bill gives him compensation for his services and for his certificates." 13 Pa. 228. In the case of Lusk v. Carlin, 5 Ill. 895, which was an action on the official bond of the recorder of deeds, for failing to note a mortgage in his certificate of search, the court says: "It is contended that it is not a duty of the recorder to examine and give information whether land is incumbered, as it would frequently involve a question as to the legal effect of the conveyance of record. In this sense of examination, he is not bound to make it, but we are of the opinion that he is bound to search and give information of the fact whether there are deeds, mortgages, or writings concerning the land, and refer the party to them, so he may be enabled to judge for himself, and take counsel as to the manner in which the title is affected or the estate incumbered by them. The search should be diligent, and his information true, as for it he is entitled to compensation." The court refers to various provisions of the statutes of Illinois relating to the duty of the recorder, and says: "The whole scope and spirit of these provisions seem to me to point out this service as an official duty of the recorder; and I think the fees, perquisites, and emoluments of his office a good, continuing, and valuable consideration to charge the surety in the bond, within the principle laid down in the case of United States v. Linn, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 811, 10 L. ed. 750.

In New York and other states it is made the duty of certain officials having the custody of public records to make searches, and certify the result thereof, and it is held that the officer is liable for any error or misstatement in such certificate. We have not been able, however, to find any case—nor has counsel called our attention to any—where the officer has been held liable on a certificate which the law did not require him to make, and where he received no compensation for making the search. In Warvelle on Abstracts, (page 66,) the author says: "It is frequently the custom of the examiner to append to an abstract of this character certificates of the officers having the custody of records examined, yet in the majority of cases the said certificates do not materially enhance the value of the examination as evidence, and, unless forming a part of their official duty, create no responsibility on the part of the certifying officer." This case is in itself a strong illustration of the hardship of a rule which should hold the clerk of the district court liable for any error in such a certificate for the sum of twenty-five cents, which he would be entitled to have for making any formal certificate whatever. Under the plaintiff's theory of this case, he would be held bound to examine every record in his office which in any wise affected the title to these lands, and to state, over his signature, correctly, the legal effect of every record which in any manner affected the title. There is nothing in this case tending to show that the defendant was called on to make any transcripts of any records in his possession. Had the plaintiff obtained a transcript of the pleadings in the Oakman Case, in the exercise of ordinary business prudence she would have submitted such transcripts to a counselor learned in the law, for his opinion as to their effect on the title to this property, and as to the risks she would incur by purchasing the property pending such litigation.

Many authorities are cited by counsel as to the liability of attorneys, physicians, and other persons who fail to use care and skill in their employment.

These authorities cast but little light on this case. The general doctrine, we think, is correctly stated in Story, Bailm. § 455: "Where the particular business or employment requires skill, if the bailee is known not to possess it, or he does not exercise the particular art or employment to which it belongs, and he makes no pretension to skill in it, then, if the bailor, with full notice, trusts him with the undertaking, the bailee is bound only for a reasonable exercise of the skill which he possesses, or of the judgment which he can employ; and, if any loss ensues from his want of due skill, he is not chargeable." There is no evidence in this case tending to show that the defendant held himself out to the public as skilled in the examination of public records, or in determining their legal effect. He himself testifies that he used such care and judgment as he possessed, and that it was his opinion that the title to the property described in the abstract was not affected by the Clover suit. If the plaintiff employed the defendant at all to pass his opinion or to certify as to the effect of the records in that case, she certainly employed him for a very meager consideration. We are not prepared to say that any consideration whatever was paid in this case for a search. The defendant did not claim to be a lawyer, nor was there any evidence that he claimed to have skill. We think the plaintiff was not entitled to the benefit of any higher order of judgment than the defendant in fact possessed, and that in relying on such a certificate, so obtained, if loss occurs, she must herself bear it, under all the circumstances, as they are shown by the record in this case. Certainly there is a wide difference between the liability of a lawyer, or other person claiming to have especial qualifications for determining questions affecting the title to land, and that of a layman, who neither has nor professes to have any. We conclude, then, that the defendant is not liable for any error in judgment as to the condition of the title to the land described in the abstract, even though such error be a gross one; and it may well be doubted whether he would be liable, where he receives merely the fee allowed by law for a certificate, unless guilty of fraud or willful misstatement.

We think the judgment of the trial court was right, and it will be affirmed.

The exceptionally small size of young cattle, such as calves and yearlings, on account of which they are able to pass through or under barbed wire fence, will not exonerate the owner of the fence for its insufficiency, where the statutes allow cattle to run at large, so as to give him a right of action for their trespass, although when the fence was built all cattle in the neighborhood were of a larger kind, against which the fence was sufficient.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Donley County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover for injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon plaintiffs by defendant's negligence in permitting cattle to break into plaintiff's enclosure. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Matlock & Peacock and W. R. Butler, for plaintiff in error:

The allegation of the scienter is a material and a necessary allegation and must be proved.

Appellee's original petition falls to allege any knowledge on the part of appellant that the cattle were infected with disease or were liable to communicate disease to appellee's cattle at the time they were placed in appellant's pasture.

Simply turning one's cattle, having an infectious disease, into his own pasture adjoining the pasture of another occupied by cattle, is not unlawful, nor such an act or wrong or negligence as will give to the owner of the adjoining premises a cause of action for damages sustained in consequence of the disease being communicated to his cattle.

NOTE.—Sufficiency of fences.
In general.

Where the common-law liability (requiring the owner of stock to restrain them at home) has been superseded by statute defining the fence that the owner of the crops must have to protect himself, and thus creating an entirely different relation from that at common-law, the statutory requirements as to the fence being "lawful" must be strictly pursued in order that the owner of stock may be liable for their intrusion.

A good and sufficient fence required where cattle are allowed to run at large is one that will turn hogs that are not breachy. Headen v. Rust, 39 Ill. 126; Misner v. Lighthall, 13 Ill. 609.

If a fence around a pasture is reasonably secure it is sufficient to relieve the owner from liability for damages caused by the escape of a bull, especially if caused by the aggrieved party. Weide v. Thiel, 9 Ill. App. 223.

The question as to whether a fence around a lot was sufficient to confine a vicious young stallion, is one for the jury, where the fence was such as was common among farmers and usually considered safe. McIlvaine v. Lantz, 100 Pa. 536, 45 Am. Rep. 400.

In an action for damages from cattle breaking into an enclosure it is immaterial whether any fences other than the outside ones were sufficient. Crisman v. Masters, 23 Ind. 819.

If cattle feeding on the commons trespass upon an enclosure, the owner thereof can only maintain his action therefor by showing that his fence is a statutory one, but if cattle of another break over a good and sufficient legal fence into one field, and from thence into another field of the same owner separated from the first by an insufficient fence, such owner may maintain trespass for damage 22 L. R. A.

done in the last field. Herold v. Meyers, 20 Iowa, 378.

But the owner of sheep is not liable for trespass by them where they pass through an insufficient fence which the adjoining owner was bound to repair, and then into a lot owned by the same party which is enclosed by a sufficient fence. Page v. Olcott, 13 N. H. 339.

Where cattle were held for trespassing and the owner sued in replevin and proved that the fence of the defendant was not a "lawful fence" as required by Indiana, 1 Gavin & Hord Stat., 342, an offer to prove that it was such as was kept in that locality where fences were taken in during the winter, to avoid the spring freshets, was properly refused. Blizzard v. Walker, 32 Ind. 437.

In an action of damages for trespass of cattle the plaintiff need only show that his fence was a lawful fence at the place of breach. Crane v. Ellis, 31 Iowa, 310; Rice v. Nagle, 14 Kan. 493.

But it was held in Missouri, to the contrary, that, in order to recover for damages from trespassing animals under Mo. Rev. Stat., §§ 3661-3663, the field must be enclosed by a hedge or fence of specified dimensions and structure, and no recovery can be had if it is not lawful even though it may be where the animals entered. Stovall v. Emerson, 20 Mo. App. 322.

So under the Tennessee Act of 1807, chap. 2, providing that a fence must be at least five feet high, a plaintiff cannot recover for damages from trespassing cattle if his fence is not that high although the cattle entered over a place that was five feet in height. Polk v. Lane, 4 Yerg. 38.

This is on the ground that the stock may have been previously tempted by the low place in the fence and thus acquired bad habits.

To recover in Iowa for trespass from cattle the plaintiff must show "that his fence is such as would 499, 48 Am. Rep. 814; Gibbs v. Coykendall, supra.

When cattle are confined in one's own pasture, and they are such as are liable to infect cattle in an adjoining pasture, if permitted to mix and mingle with them, and this fact is known to a person who carelessly leaves his gates open or fences down, or who has an insufficient fence and permits such cattle to enter his pasture and communicate to his cattle an infectious disease, the owner thereof cannot recover any damages for loss or injury occasioned thereby.

Walker v. Herron, supra.

The appellant, in pursuance of its lawful business, placed its cattle upon its own premises, and if said cattle were such as might communicate disease to other stock in the adjoining pasture and appellant was ignorant of that fact, it would not be liable in damages in case disease was communicated by them to appellee's cattle in an adjoining pasture.

Cooke v. Waring, 2 Hurlst. & C. 332, 83 L. J. Exch. 262.

If an injury is caused by a person to the property of another in a place where such party has a right to be, the party complaining of such injury must show that he has used due diligence to protect his property against such injury.

Plaintiff cannot recover in this case even if defendant had known when it placed the cattle in its pasture, in Donley county, that the same were liable to communicate disease to plaintiff's cattle, unless the evidence shows that defendant was guilty of culpable negligence and willfulness in the care and custody, management and handling of their cattle, and as a result of such culpability and willfulness plaintiff's cattle contracted the disease and died therefrom.

If it appears from the evidence that plaintiffs were guilty of culpable negligence, or that their negligence contributed to the injury they suffered, whatever may be the degree of their negligence notwithstanding the defendant may have been guilty of negligence yet plaintiffs cannot recover.

turn ordinary cattle." Heath v. Coltenback, 5 Iowa, 490.

Landowners in Connecticut are not obliged to fence against unruly cattle, and evidence that a horse jumped out of an enclosure over a lawful fence is evidence that he was unruly and could not be restrained by an ordinary fence "ordinary fences," mentioned in Conn. Gen. Stat., title 21, § 12, does not mean lawful fences but such fences as are common and sufficient to restrain orderly cattle. Hine v. Wooding, 37 Conn. 123.

A good, strong, substantial fence built of stone sufficient to turn stock, forming a perfect enclosure, is a lawful fence within the meaning of the statute, although it is not specifically described therein. Meade v. Watson, 67 Cal. 591.

The "suitable" fence required of a railroad company by Mass. Gen. Stat., chap. 63, § 43, need not necessarily be such as are required of landowners under Gen. Stat., chap. 26, § 1, and described as "legal and sufficient." Bames v. Salem & L. R. Co. 98 Mass. 590, 98 Am. Dec. 676.

As the custom in Colorado is for sheep always to be herded, a farmer is not required to fence against sheep there. Willard v. Mathesus, 7 Colo. 76.

double damages for failing to maintain a division fence, the plaintiff must show that the fence when divided was a lawful statutory fence, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, §§ 5556, 5561; Mackler v. Cramer, 43 Mo. App. 373, 32 Mo. App. 542.

Where the fence enclosing A's land is built on the land of B, and B's cattle trespass on A's land, a recovery may be had if the fence was of the required statutory character and dimensions and was treated as a partition fence. Moore v. White, 45 Mo. 203.

Description of fence required.

In Pennsylvania it was held that with such a fence as farmers of practical knowledge and experience consider sufficient to protect crops, although not made of logs, or rails or posts, or boards, and not "four and one half feet high and well-staked and ridged," an action may be maintained for injury from cattle. Race v. Snyder, 10 Phila. 533.

But the cases generally hold that an owner of land cannot maintain an action for damages caused by cattle breaking over a fence that is less than the height required by law, although it is a good ordinary fence. Runyan v. Patterson, 87 N. C. 843.

Damages for injury to growing crops cannot be maintained unless the fence enclosing the same is such as the Alabama Code (Rev. Code, §§ 1232, 1233) requires. Pruitt v. Ellington, 56 Ala. 454. The court refused to instruct that the fence must be five feet high and for this error the case was reversed.

Where a fence is not four and a half feet high as required by Missouri Wagner's Stat., chap. 71, p. 708, no recovery can be had for trespassing stock. Mann v. Williamson, 70 Mo. 661.

Under Taylor's Kan. Gen. Stat., par. 3061, providing that a lawful fence must be at least four feet high, an instruction that a fence averaging four feet, or about four feet high, would be sufficient

If it appears from the evidence that both plaintiff and defendant were negligent and that thereby injury ensued to plaintiff though it cannot be known whether the injury was caused at one time or another or at what place, or in what particular manner it was occasioned, plaintiff cannot recover, or if the fault was mutual they cannot recover.

Stat. § 340, § 5, subsec. 11, authorizing the electors of a town to determine the time and manner in which stock shall be permitted to go at large in the highways, a party having a fence less than that required cannot recover for trespasses from stock. Hardenburgh v. Lockwood, 25 Barb. 9.

Under Oregon Mts. Laws, title 1, chap. 15, providing that fields shall be enclosed with a fence sufficiently close, and four and one-half feet high, and that the owner of stock trespassing over the same is liable in damages, a complaint is defective if it fails to allege that the field of plaintiff was so fenced. Campbell v. Bridwell, 5 Or. 311.

Under the Illinois fence law the five-foot requirement applies only to partition fences, others need only be high enough to turn ordinary livestock; and where plaintiff's fence is good and sufficient regardless of height to turn ordinary stock he may recover for damages to his crops. *Scott v. The object of the Act of April 18, 1879, was merely to prescribe such a fence as would enable landowners to enforce certain remedies against the owners of trespassing animals, and not to prohibit any other kind of fence.

Worthington v. Wade, 82 Tex. 28.

The court of appeals in the case of Ohio Wool Growing Co. v. Bogel, 3 Tex. Ct. App. Civ. Cas. § 273, held that an action would lie against defendant for entering upon the plaintiff's unenclosed lands with 5,000 sheep and herding same upon such land over the protests of the plaintiff.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in the district court of Donley county by the defendants in error to recover of plaintiff in error damages for an alleged trespass of the latter's cattle upon the pasture of the former. It was claimed equal strength and security. Phillips v. Oystee, 33 Iowa, 257.

In an instruction that the jury should find "whether plaintiff's fence was a lawful fence, four and a half feet high, with spaces sufficiently close; was the fence four and a half feet high, and such as is generally, in this country, recognized as a good fence?" This is a matter entirely in your discretion."—the word "discretion" does not refer to the statutory definition of a fence but implies judgment, and in this sense applies well enough to those qualities of a fence which are in their nature undefined, as when the statute describes it as of strong materials put up in a good and substantial manner, with sufficiently small spaces. McManus v. Finan, 4 Iowa, 283.

It is no defense that a fence is not the statutory height, when the defendant negligently left the fence down so that cattle entered and trespassed. Crawford v. Maxwell, 3 Humph. 476.

Where an order requiring a partition fence to be built did not fix its height, and it was built sufficient to answer the purpose, a recovery may be had for contribution, although not of the height which had been decided upon by the voters of the town for all fences. Ketchum v. Stolp, 15 Ill. 341.

Where parties have kept up a hog-tight fence between each other for sixteen years and one party replaces it when it becomes worn out, by building a lawful fence which is not hog tight, he can recover for damages to his crops from the hog of the other. Panther v. Trauman (Iowa) Oct. 7, 1893.

The Tennessee Code, § 1682, providing that "every planter" shall keep about his cleared land a fence five feet high, and hog tight three feet high, does not apply to lots in cities or towns. Staub v. Fantz, 11 Helsk. 706.

The partition fence in a borough in Pennsylvania in the petition that the plaintiffs' cattle had died by reason of a disease communicated to them by those of the defendant. There was a judgment for the plaintiffs, which, upon appeal by the defendant, was affirmed in the court of civil appeals. It was shown upon the trial that the plaintiffs were the owners of a pasture embracing 2,000 acres, which was enclosed by a wire fence, and upon which they held about 100 head of cattle. This pasture was entirely surrounded by a much larger one, which was owned by the defendant corporation, and which was also enclosed by a fence of the same general character. The fence of plaintiffs, as they testified, was constructed of "posts about 80 feet apart, with four barbed wires, and three or four stays between each post." In 1889 the defendant company placed in its pasture a large number of East Texas cattle, which were less in size than the cattle of the Panhandle section. Some of these cattle passed through the plaintiffs' fence, and into their pasture, and there was evidence sufficient to justify a finding that they communicated a disease to some of plaintiffs' cattle, from which they died. The fence appears to have been passed through by the young cattle, presumably the calves and yearlings. One of the plaintiffs testified that "they [meaning the cattle] would crawl through the fence." The other also testified as follows: "They were small, and just walked through our fence."

The court charged the jury as follows: "Every entry of one's own cattle upon the lands or premises of another is a trespass, and the owner of such cattle will be liable for any damages sustained by the owner of such premises, if any, provided such lands or premises were at the time of such entry enclosed by a fence sufficient to exclude therefrom such cattle or animals as were accustomed to be used in the country or the range around and about such enclosed premises, and provided, further, that such trespass is effected by a forcible entry through such fence or enclosure." This charge was assigned as error, upon the appeal to the court of civil appeals, and the assignment is insisted upon in this court. Neither the courts nor the legislature of this state have ever recognized the rule of the common law of England which requires every man to restrain his cattle either by tethering or by enclosure. Davis v. Davis, 70 Tex. 128. Hence, if the cattle of one person wander upon the unenclosed lands of another, or upon his lands imperfectly enclosed, they are not trespassers, and the owner is not liable for any damage that they may inflict. It follows that one who desires to secure his lands against the encroachments of livestock running at large, either upon the open range or in an adjoining field or pasture, must throw around it an enclosure sufficient to prevent the entry of all ordinary animals of the class intended to be excluded. If he does not, the owner of animals that may encroach upon it will not be held liable for any damage that may result from such encroachment. This is the necessary result of the right of the owners of domestic animals to permit them to run at large as recognized by the laws of this state. Since he does not owe the duty of confining his cattle, he is guilty of no negligence, and he does no wrong by allowing them to go unconfined, and is not responsible for their acts if, by reason of an insecure fence, they inflict damage upon the lands of a neighbor; in other words, their encroachment upon another's land is not a trespass. If, however, he drives his cattle upon the enclosed land of another, however imperfectly enclosed, he is guilty of a trespass, for which he is liable to answer need not be a tight board fence if it is substantial. Trego v. Pierce, 119 Pa. 129.

Under Missouri Rev. Stat. 1845 (Inclosure Act, p. 575), one cannot justify killing trespassing hogs unless his fence is of statutory dimension, and an instruction that "if the defendant's fence owing to high water would not keep out the plaintiff's pigs whether the fence was legal or not they will find for the defendant," is error. Early v. Fleming, 16 Mo. 154.

The hog law in Missouri, Sess. Acts 1885, p. 166, required in such counties where swine were prohibited from running at large that the fence should be built of posts and boards with posts set firmly in the ground not more than eight feet apart, and boards substantially one inch thick and six inches wide securely fastened thereto and the upper board being at least four and one half feet high and the two remaining boards placed at proper distances below to resist horses, cattle, and like stock. Crumley v. Kansas City, C. & S. R. Co. 33 Mo. App. 505.

Where hogs are not permitted to run at large in Kansas in certain townships, a railroad company is only required to construct a fence prescribed by the statute, the bottom rail, board or plank of which is not more than two feet from the ground. Leavenworth, T. & S. W. R. Co. v. Forbes, 37 Kan. 450.

A railroad company is not required to build a hog-tight fence in Kansas. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Yates, 21 Kan. 613.

Indiana Act, March 2, 1891, made the word "cattle" applicable to "hogs" where, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4848, a lawful partition fence was such as would restrain sheep unless it was agreed to build a fence to restrain horses, mules, or cattle. Endere v. McDonald, 5 Ind. App. 297.

A defect in a common fence through which hogs entered an enclosure from the outside, where the field is cultivated by several under a common fence, will not authorize the punishment of the owner of the stock for knowingly permitting them to go at large. It is not necessary that the enclosing fence should be a statutory fence though it should be substantial. In this case the owner of the crops was responsible for the condition of the fence. Cole v. State, 72 Ala. 216.

A person may recover contribution for building a hedge on a boundary line under Iowa Acts 1876, chap. 108, § 2, although there were short distances on the line where the hedge would not grow. McKeever v. Jenks, 59 Iowa. 300.

A party is not obliged to construct a fence which can resist a storm that unroofed houses. Norling v. Allee, 81 N. Y. S. R. 412.

The Iowa Revision, § 1544, providing for a lawful fence "or other construction or fence" "of equal strength and security to the enclosure" applies to a bluff, hedge, trench, wall, trestle, or the like. Hilliard v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 37 Iowa, 442.

Under N. C. Code, § 1062, providing a penalty for injuring a fence surrounding or about a yard, field, or pasture, posts nine feet apart, on which near the tops were nailed slats placed alongside of in damages. Davis v. Davis, supra. Tested by the rule we have announced, the charge under consideration cannot be sustained. Abstractly considered, it admits of a holding that if only sheep "were accustomed to be used in the country or in the range around and about the enclosed premises," and the owner of the land had a fence sufficient to exclude such animals, one who should bring in neat cattle, and leave them unconfined upon adjacent lands, would be held to respond in damages for any loss that might ensue by reason of their encroaching upon the enclosed premises. It is clear that such is not the law. It is but just, however, to the learned judge who tried the case, to say that it is apparent from the entire charge, in the light of the testimony, that he did not intend to lay down so broad a doctrine. He referred solely to neat cattle. But the possible construction we have suggested serves to illustrate what we conceive to be an error in the instruction, when applied, as doubtless intended, to the latter class of animals only. We do not hold that for no breach of his fence, and invasion of his pasture by domestic animals, could a landowner recover under our laws. It may be admitted that, if his enclosure be sufficient to exclude all cattle of an ordinary disposition, he would have the right to recover for the trespass of such as were peculiarly vicious and prone to break fences. The owner of a dog may, as a general rule, permit him with impunity to run at large; but if he know him to be vicious, and does not restrain him, he is liable for any injury he may inflict upon person or property; and it would seem that the same principle should apply to the owner of any domestic animal known to him as being accustomed to break through an ordinarily good and sufficient fence. But upon what principle are we to draw a distinction between small cattle and large? If the fact that all the cattle in the neighborhood of his pasture were of large breeds when his fence was constructed would relieve the owner of the necessity of making his fence sufficiently close to keep out small cattle that might be brought into the country, why should he be not relieved of the necessity of fencing against hogs, provided there were no hogs within reach when he made his enclosure? The owner of the little "dogies," (as the witness calls them,) such as crawled or walked so freely under the wires of plaintiffs' fence, had precisely the same right to permit them to go at large as his neighbors had who owned Herefords or Shorthorns; and it could make no difference who came first with his cattle in the neighborhood. It is equally unimportant whether others in the same section or neighborhood kept the same kind of cattle or not. It is the right of every owner of domestic animals in this state, not known to be diseased, vicious, or "breachy," to allow them to run at large, and this without reference to the size or class of such animals kept by others in the same neighborhood. For these reasons we think there was error in the charge complained of, for which the judgment must be reversed.

We are of the opinion that the Act of March 26, 1879, (2 Sayles' Civ. Stat. art. 4609a,) applies only to counties and subdivisions of counties in which the provisions of chapter 4 of title 93 of the Revised Statutes have been put in force by an election. So, also, title 43, in relation to fences, applies only to lands in cultivation, and not to pasture lands. They have no bearing upon this case, except in so far as they evince a recognition by the legislature of the general rule that owners of domestic animals have a road, but which did not connect with any fence, is not such a fence as is protected. State v. Roberts, 101 N. C. 744.

Contracts.

Holding cattle under Miss. Code, § 1922, providing for taking cattle damage feasant, can only be justified where there is a lawful fence, and cannot be maintained because such party violates his agreement to keep his part of a division fence in repair. Dent v. Roes, 52 Miss. 188.

The kind of a partition fence to be maintained by the adjoining owners, may be modified by agreement. Bruner v. Palmer, 108 Ind. 397.

Where A and B exchanged lands and A agreed to make the fences and maintain them, and B's cattle break through into A's ground, the agreement is no bar to trespass by A, though the agreement is by deed; but his remedy is by an action of case on the promise if without deed, or on covenant, if by deed. Mich. 41 & 42 Eliz. B. R.; Nowel v. Smith, Cro. Eliz. 709.

Where adjoining proprietors are required by statute each to keep up the whole of a partition fence, and they agree that each shall keep up one half, an action of trespass will not lie for failure but the remedy is for breach of contract. Moore v. Levert, 24 Ala. 310.

Where under the statutes of Alabama (Clay Dig. 241) each adjoining proprietor is bound to keep the entire division fence in repair, neither can maintain an action of trespass against the other for damages consequent upon an insufficient fence, 22 L. R. A.

and if each contracts to keep up half and fails, an action of trespass cannot be maintained. Walker v. Watrous, 8 Ala. 493, 43 Am. Dec. 645.

But when parties contract to keep a division fence in repair and to arbitrate damages, on the failure of one party to recognize the contract, an action lies for trespass of stock. Berry v. Carter, 19 Kan. 135.

A petition for damages from trespassing stock, for failure of contract to keep fence in repair may be good at common law although it fails to state a good cause of action under the statute. Kneale v. Price, 21 Mo. App. 236.

Where the lessee for five years agreed to plant and grow a good and substantial hedge by the close of his term, this does not mean a hedge that would turn stock but only that he would plant and faithfully cultivate the same. Gilchrist v. Gilchrist, 78 Ill. 281.

Under a contract to maintain a hedge "until the same shall be sufficient to turn ordinary stock and such as is contemplated by the laws of Kansas relating to hedge fences," "ordinary stock" means such as is permitted by law to run at large. Usher v. Hiatt, 21 Kan. 543.

This note is confined to one subject of "sufficiency of fences" and does not touch the kindred questions as to duty to maintain fences either for division fences, outside fences, or railroad fences.

As to the duty to fence against cattle of others, see note to Bulph v. Matthews, ante, 55.

the right in this state to permit them to run at large.

In order to obviate any misconception of the scope of this opinion, we call attention to the radical distinction between this case and that of Davis v. Davis, supra. In that case the defendant drove his cattle upon the plaintiffs' enclosed land. That made him a willful trespasser. In this the defendant corporation merely put its cattle upon its own pasture, and they passed the plaintiffs' fence of their own volition. If the agents of the defendant corporation knew that their cattle could pass through the plaintiffs' enclosure, and that they were likely to communicate disease to the latter's cattle, it was negligence on its part not to confine them, and for the consequences of that negligence it would be liable.

The judgments of the District Court and of the Court of Civil Appeals are reversed, and the cause remanded.

ERROR to the District Court for Nuckolls County to review a judgment in favor of NOTE.—Statutes of limitation as applicable to bank checks.

So far as we can find, the above case stands alone in declaring that the statute of limitations begins to run on a check at the expiration of a reasonable time for presentment, although surprisingly few cases which have in any way decided the point are discoverable.

Indeed Grant on Banking, § 53, published in 1857, said: "Whether the plea of the statute of limitations would be a good answer to an action by the payee against the drawer has never been decided, but it seems that such defense, in case of a check, presented more than six years after delivery to the payee, might perhaps be taken under the plea of the statute." But since that time a few cases have been decided.

In First Nat. Bank of Newton v. Needham, 29 Iowa, 249, it is said that a check is not due within the meaning of the statute of limitations or for other purposes until demand of payment, but this was by way of argument only as the statute of limitations was not involved in the case.

Again in Cowling v. Altman, 71 N. Y. 435, 27 Am. Rep. 70, it is said that the statute of limitations on a check runs from demand of payment, but this was entirely obiter and made in discussing the question of the dishonor of the check.

So in Bull v. First Nat. Bank of Kasson, 128 U. S. 105, 31 L. ed. 97, in deciding that a bank check was not overdue so as to subject it to equities, it was said, quoting from Merchants Nat. Bank of Boston v. State Nat. Bank of Boston, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 604, 19 L. ed. 1008, "that it is not due until payment is demanded, and the statute of limitations runs only from that time." But in neither of these cases was the statute of limitations involved.

But in Re Boyse, L. R. 38 Ch. Div. 612, 56 L. J. Ch. 126, it is directly decided that the statute of limitations does not run upon a check until presentment as there is no liability on the part of the drawer until that time.

On the other hand, where a check was remitted by mail in March, 1878, the drawer expecting to negotiate a loan to meet it and then to inform the holder, but as he died shortly afterwards the check never was presented and would not have been paid if presented, it was held that the statute of limitations began to run when a letter was received stating that the loan would not be completed. Re Bethell, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 561, 56 L. J. Ch. 334.

The court makes a distinction between those cases where time runs from presentment on the ground that here there was no obligation to present the check. The Act, 45 & 46 Vict. chap. 61, although not governing this case, is accepted as declaratory of the prior law—providing that presentment must be in a reasonable time but presentment may be dispensed with where the drawee is not bound as between himself and drawer to accept or pay the bill, and the drawer has no reason to believe the bill will be paid.

The same distinction is supported, but not pointed out, in Brush v. Barrett, 82 N. Y. 400, 37 Am. Rep. 559, affirmed, Brush v. Barrett, 16 Hun, 400, which decides that where the drawer of a check has no funds in bank to meet the same, the statute of limitations runs from the date of the check, even if the check was not presented, as such a check is due immediately and suit may be maintained against the drawer without demand of the bank. Six years will defeat the action in New York.

In Culver v. Marks, 7 L. R. A. 489, 122 Ind. 554, the doctrine is recognized that the payee may at once bring suit on a check if the drawer has no funds on deposit to meet the check. But the case is peculiarly unsatisfactory on the question of limitations, merely holding that the check is not barred by the statute, although the facts were that it was drawn in 1869 or 1870 and claim filed thereon in 1885 against the estate of the maker who died in 1884. We understand that the statute applicable to checks made the limitation period ten years with eighteen months addition in case of the debtor's death, so that it is not easy to see the ground of the decision. The doctrine recognized in the case that the payee might sue at once if no funds were on deposit, would seem to set the statute in motion from that date, and if so the checks would seem to have been barred. But there was in the case the additional facts of the maker's promise to pay the check without presentment and the payee's promise not to present it. What effect these facts may have on the question of limitations is not stated, but they are discussed only as excusing presentment. How these facts can be regarded as taking the case out of the rule that makes the check due at once if funds are not ready to meet it and plaintiff in an action upon a check. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Meers, John M. Ragan, Robert Ryan, and S. A. Searle for plaintiff in error.

Mr. H. W. Short for defendant in error.

Irvine, C., filed the following opinion:
The defendant in error sued the plaintiff in error in the district court of Nuckolls county upon a check drawn by plaintiff in error to the order of defendant in error for $746.22, upon Scroggin & Son, bankers, Mt. Pulaski, Ill., and dated November 10, 1882. He alleged presentment and dishonor of the check November 14, 1888. The suit was begun February 20, 1889. The plaintiff in error in answer pleaded—First, the statute of limitations; second, that the check was presented and paid at or about the day of its date; third, matter claimed to operate in estoppel, which it will not be necessary here to notice. The reply amounts to a general denial. The case was tried to the court, a jury being waived, and there was a general finding and judgment for the defendant in error.

One of the errors assigned, and the only one which we shall notice, is that the court erred in not finding that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. This assignment raises the question as to when the statute begins to run upon a bank check in an action against the drawer of the check. A check is in some respects analogous to a bill of exchange, or a note payable on demand. On notes payable on demand the statute of limitations has been held to run from the date of the note. Little v. Blunt, 9 Pick. 488; Wenman v. Mohawk Ins. Co. 13 Wend. 267. Where a drawer of a check had no funds to meet it, it was held that the statute began to run from the date of the check. Brush v. Barrett, 82 N. Y. 400, 37 Am. Rep. 569. It is true that the last case was decided upon the theory that, inasmuch as the drawer had no funds in the bank to meet the check, presentment immediately would have been unavailing, and a cause of action, therefore, arose in favor of the payee as soon as the check was given. We can see, too, that there is a distinction between a note payable on demand and a check, as an action lies at once against the maker of a demand note without actual prior demand. Norton v. Ellam, 2 Mees. & W. 461; Burnham v. Allen, 1 Gray, 496; New Hope Delaware Bridge Co. v. Perry, 11 Ill. 467, 52 Am. Dec. 443. Nevertheless a check is not designed for circulation, but for immediate presentment. First Nat. Bank of Wyomere v. Miller (Neb.) 55 N. W. Rep. 1064.

make a demand necessary on the maker before a right of action accrued, we do not clearly see as they would seem to be merely a waiver of presentment which was in this case already waived by lack of funds on deposit making the check due at once. It is likely, however, that some facts of importance are not stated in the opinion. The finding shows that interest was allowed from 1878, and if there was some fact which made that the date from which the statute would begin to run the decision would be perfectly clear.

In Rogers v. Durant, 140 U. S. 206, 85 L. ed. 461, it was held that a bank check is a bill of exchange within the terms of Ill. Stat. 1870, 8d ed. p. 430, § 17, 18, prescribing the term of five years after the cause of action accrues, and not thereafter, as the time within which an action thereon must be commenced.

In this case it does not appear whether the cause of action accrued from the date of the instrument or demand, but the question was whether a check was controlled by the statute of limitations as to bills of exchange.

Where the original check by a New Orleans bank on a Pennsylvania bank was lost, but a duplicate was protested for nonpayment eight years after date, it is held that "checks of this kind are used for purposes of immediate circulation; but the law is well settled that they must be presented for payment within a reasonable time," and that the action was also barred under La. Civ. Code, § 3502, in five years from the time when the check was payable. Harman v. Claiborne, 1 La. Ann. 842.

Where plaintiff loaned the defendant money and gave him check for the amount, which check was not paid by the plaintiff's bankers until several days after, but defendant had obtained credit for the same at his bank, the statute of limitation in an action by plaintiff against the defendant for that amount, only ran from the time of the payment of the check by plaintiff's bankers, and not from the date of the check. Garden v. Bruce, L. R. 3 C. P. 380.

This is not a case based on the check but on the receipt of the money.

Although mere laches in presentation of a check is not within the subject of this note, it will be noticed that in cases of laches it is often said that no delay less than the statutory period will be a bar unless by insolvency or other change of circumstances the situation of the parties has been changed.

In First Nat. Bank of Tamaqua v. Shoemaker, 117 Pa. 94, an amendment to change a suit by the payee on a check to one by the drawer for the payee's use was denied after the statute had run against the drawer although the suit was begun by the payee before the statute had run.

Where a bank check or bill of exchange was dated March 8, 1882, protested 1885, presentment to drawers for payment excused by condition of country from war, judgment in 1890 was given against the drawer on the ground that a holder of a check need not present the same after insolvency of the drawee. The statute of limitation does not appear to have been pleaded. Jackson Ins. Co. v. Sturges, 12 Helsk. 339.

Certified check.

The holder of a check marked "good" stands in the same position towards the bank as the original depositor, and the statute of limitation in favor of the bank does not run until payment has been actually demanded at the banking house and refused. Girard Bank v. Bank of Pennsylvania Twp. 99 Pa. 92, 30 Am. Dec. 507.

In this case the bank had acknowledged that money was on deposit by paying a duplicate check and taking a bond of indemnity against this check outstanding, which was construed to suspend the statute. The check had been mislaid and suit was sustained although demand was made more than seven years from date.

The same doctrine that a certified check cannot be dishonored by lapse of time alone is declared in Tripp v. Curtenius, 36 Mich. 494, 24 Am. Rep. 320, although the case there actually presented was in respect to a certificate of deposit.

The time within which presentment must be made is quite limited. Ordinarily, when the payee of a check and the bank upon which it is drawn are in the same town, a check must be presented before the close of banking hours the day after it is received (see cases cited in note to Holmes v. Briggs, 17 Am. St. Rep. 804); otherwise it should be forwarded for presentment the day after it is received by the payee, and presented the day after it is received by the agent for collection. Special circumstances may excuse a greater delay, but no excuse is pleaded or proved for the delay in this case. We think that the statute should be deemed to have begun to run at the latest upon the expiration of a reasonable time for presenting the check, and that a delay for over six years would complete the bar of the statute beyond all question.

It is claimed by defendant in error that delay in presenting the check does not release the drawer unless he has been injured. This is the rule where suit is brought within the period of limitation, but the statute in all cases bars relief. The statute runs in favor of the drawer as well as others.

It is also claimed that the drawer has during the whole period resided in Illinois, and that the statutory period there is ten years. This may be true, but it is neither pleaded nor proved. The court cannot take judicial notice of the law of another state, but, in the absence of proof, it will be presumed to be like that of our own. Lord v. State, 17 Neb. 526; Bailey v. State (Neb.) 55 N. W. Rep. 241. Presuming the law of Illinois to be the same as our own, the action had been barred by the laws of that state at the time it was commenced here, and was therefore barred here. Code Civ. Proc. § 18; Howe v. Aultman, 27 Neb. 251. Aside from the failure of proof upon this point, the pleadings entirely failed to present the issue. Upon the face of the petition the action was barred, and a demurrer would have lain.

Reversed and remanded.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

OLD COLONY R. CO.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

BOSTON & ALBANY R. CO.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The attorney-general can properly institute proceedings, under Stat. 1892, chap. 389, to require a railroad company to issue mileage tickets and receive those of other companies since it is not a proceeding in equity, but rather a petition for a writ of mandamus in a matter concerning the public.

2. A statute requiring railroad companies to issue mileage tickets and to receive those of other roads in payment of fare, without providing any fund for their redemption, or making them a lien on any tangible property, or putting any limit on the number of them which may be issued, or the time within which they must be used, is unconstitutional, as an appropriation of individual property to public use without the owner's consent, and without legal provision for a reasonable compensation therefor.

(November 3, 1893.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full court of petitions by the attorney-general

NOTE.—The great practical importance of the above case and the difficulty of the questions involved render it of unusual interest. The questions are so fully discussed in the opinions of the judges that no attempt to annotate them will be made.

against the defendant railroad companies to compel them to comply with the Statute of 1892, chap. 389, requiring them to issue mileage tickets and to receive those of other roads in payment of fare. Dismissed.

The following shows the form of the petition:

"Albert E. Pillsbury, attorney-general, in behalf of the commonwealth, informs the court that the Old Colony Railroad Company is a railroad corporation established under the laws of the commonwealth, and operating a railroad therein; and that it is required by a law of the commonwealth, being chapter 389 of the Acts of the year 1892, to provide and have on sale for twenty dollars, and to sell to all persons applying therefor, mileage tickets for passenger transportation representing one thousand miles; and to redeem all such tickets, or any part thereof, upon presentation by any other railroad corporation; and to accept and receive from all persons for fare and passage over its own lines all such tickets issued by any other railroad corporation operating within the commonwealth, as therein prescribed. The defendant, though duly demanded, willfully and wrongfully neglects and refuses to comply in any particular with the requirements of the law as herein above set forth, which willful and wrongful neglect and refusal has continued from the taking effect of the law until the present time, and declares its purpose and determination not to comply therewith; which conduct is a violation of the law, and of the public right thereunder, for which there is no adequate remedy except by this proceeding. Wherefore the informant prays that the defendant be required and compelled, by writ of mandamus or other appropriate process, to provide and sell such mileage tickets to all persons applying therefor, and to redeem all such tickets, or any part thereof, on presentation by any other railroad corporation, and to accept and receive from all persons for fare and passage upon all its own lines all such tickets issued by any other railroad corporation operating within the commonwealth, and in all particulars to comply with the requirements of the law as therein set forth, and for such other orders in the premises as justice may require."

Mr. A. E. Pillsbury, Atty-Gen., for petitioner:

This statute is constitutional, either (1) as a regulation of the public business in which the defendants are engaged under a public franchise, by virtue of Pub. Stat., chap. 112, § 180, or in the exercise of the general powers of the legislature; or (2) as a condition imposed upon the further exercise of the franchise, which is subject to amendment or repeal at the will of the legislature under the reservation of Pub. Stat., chap. 105, § 8, originally Stat. 1880, chap. 81; or (3) as an amendment of the charter under this reserved power.

The power of the legislature to regulate railroad tariffs within reasonable limits is settled.

Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 180; Boston & W. R. Corp. v. Western R. Corp. 14 Gray, 258; Parker v. Metropolitan R. Co. 109 Mass. 506. See also Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 560, 21 L. ed. 710; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77 et seq.; Stone v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. 116 U. S. 807, 29 L. ed. 636, and cases cited; Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. Lim.* 6th ed. 788, note 3; People v. Boston & A. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 569.

The only limitation upon this power is that it shall not require service without reward, or amount to the taking or destruction of property without compensation.

Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174, 32 L. ed. 877, and cases cited.

It is possible that the operation of the act may require the defendant to transport a passenger on presentation of a ticket which the corporation issuing it will not redeem on demand. This, however, is not to be assumed, and the constitutionality of the statute is not necessarily to be tested by the most extreme case which can possibly arise under it.

Com. v. Plaisted, 2 L. R. A. 142, 148 Mass. 375.

The court will presume that the legislature made proper inquiry into the circumstances, and that the act is capable of operating without any such consequences; and this presumption stands unless and until the contrary appears.

See Dow v. Beidelman, supra; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 220.

The act provides a sufficient compensation for the defendant for all transportation which it performs on tickets of other roads. The statute need not put the money into the defendant's hands. Even in the taking of property by eminent domain, the legislature need not go so far as that.

Fitchburg R. Co. v. Grand Junction R. & D. Co. 4 Allen, 198; Metropolitan R. Co. v. Quincy R. Co. 12 Allen, 262; Boston & W. R. Corp. v. Western R. Corp. supra; Lexington & W. C. R. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 14 Gray, 286; Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 109 Mass. 108; Metropolitan R. Co. v. Highland Street R. Co. 118 Mass. 290; Worcester & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. Id. 561, 568; Cambridge R. Co. v. Charles River Street R. Co. 139 Mass. 454.

There is no interference with the defendants' right to acquire, possess, and protect property. This act does not amount to a taking or destruction of the defendants' property. And even as to this, the legislature has a larger power over this artificial creature of its own than over the private citizen.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 646, 647, and cases cited in note; Callender v. Marsh, 1 Pick. 418, 490; Fitchburg R. Co. v. Grand Junction R. & D. Co. supra; Com. v. Eastern R. Co. 108 Mass. 254, 4 Am. Rep. 555; Cambridge v. Railroad Comrs. 153 Mass. 161, and cases cited.

There is no constitutional or other legal objection against "class legislation." The legislature is constantly legislating for and upon classes, and rightfully.

Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 26, 32 L. ed. 595, and cases cited; Hevitt v. Charier, 16 Pick. 353; Davis v. State, 3 Lea, 878; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Mackey, 38 Kan. 298; McAunich v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 20 Iowa, 888, 848; Cooley, Const. Lim. 479, 480.

The legislature is not required to deal with all railroad corporations alike, and they cannot complain of legislative discrimination among them.

If the act is to be regarded as an amendment of the defendants' charters, it is within the power of the legislature, without the consent or other action of the stockholders. And if it is, in any view, within the power of the legislature, it does not depend upon the consent of the stockholders. Their consent would be of no more effect, if of any, than the consent of the corporation, and this is unnecessary.

Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. supra.

This statute is not in conflict with the legal tender clause of the Constitution of the United States. This act does not attempt, and has no effect to establish a legal tender currency.

The statute does not impair or affect the obligation of contracts. The only contract to be affected, if any, is the defendant's charter; and it is settled that such legislation is not within this constitutional prohibition.

The act is not, in intention, operation, or effect, a regulation of interstate commerce.

If the regulation of local rates, etc., does affect interstate transportation, this does not necessarily amount to the regulation of interstate commerce, in the constitutional sense. State legislation may affect interstate commerce in various ways without amounting to unconstitutional regulation of commerce.

The legislature having power over the rates, it does not matter whether a change of rates within the power reduces the rates or the earnings or not.

There is no provision of the Old Colony Company's charter, or of the general laws, which stands in the way of this requirement, or confines the legislature to any particular method of revising or altering its rates. The whole subject is within the legislative control, under the reserved power to alter and amend charters.

The act fixes the rate; and it seems that in such a case the reasonableness of the rate is not a judicial question and is not open to revision by the court.

Budd v. New York, supra.

Mr. J. H. Benton, Jr., for defendant the Old Colony R. Co.:

This act contains no provision giving the court equity jurisdiction to enforce its provisions, as is usually the case in statutes requiring action by railroad corporations.

See Pub. Stat. chap. 112, §§ 136, 162; Laws 1890, chap. 428, § 8.

This act assumes:

1. To reduce the fares and tolls of the respondent for passenger transportation and its earnings therefrom "contrary to the provisions of its charter."

2. To reduce the fares and tolls of the respondent for passenger service and its earnings therefrom, and to fix an arbitrary rate at which it shall perform such service and also to exclude any inquiry in the courts, i. e. by due process of law as to whether such rate is reasonable compensation for the service required to be performed.

3. To require the respondent to perform such service at the rate fixed by the act and to receive in payment of the debts thereby incurred by the persons served, the contracts of other companies to perform similar service upon their lines, i. e. to perform such service not for money but upon the credit of all other companies in the commonwealth whether responsible or irresponsible.

4. To substantially affect the rates for and the conduct of interstate transportation on the respondent's road which is a connecting and continuous line of interstate transportation and travel.

5. To require the respondent and such other railroad companies operating in the state as the railroad commissioners may not exclude or exempt from the provision of the act and no others to obey it.

The act impairs the obligation of the contract as to fares and tolls contained in the charters of the respondents, and is therefore in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

The legislature put into the charter a specific provision that it would not reduce the tolls below a certain point and in a certain manner.

What was that but an agreement by the legislature that notwithstanding the existence of the general power to alter, amend, or repeal, it would exercise that power in respect to the right or franchise to take tolls only in a certain way, and within a certain limit?

"It did not mean that the legislature will not alter or reduce the tolls so as to produce less than ten per cent per annum upon the cost of making the road, unless it shall hereafter choose to do so."

Detroit v. Detroit & H. Pl. Road Co. 43 Mich. 140.

The franchise to take tolls has always been treated as property in this commonwealth.

Road Co.* 43 Mich. 140.

In Boston & L. R. Corp. v. Salem & L. R. Co., 2 Gray, 1, the provision in the charter of the plaintiff corporation that the legislature would not for twenty years authorize another railroad between Boston and Lowell was held by this court to be property.

Why is not the provision of the respondent that its tolls shall not be reduced below ten per cent as much property?

That this provision of the charters and the general law was understood to secure to railroad corporations the power of regulating their own tolls, subject only to the condition expressed in the charter, that the legislature might reduce and regulate them within the limits of a 10 per cent income, appears from Vermont & M. R. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 9 Cush. 369.

See also Fitchburg R. Co. v. Gage, 12 Gray, 893.

The question is simply whether the legislature, under a prior reserved right to amend, can take away from the corporation that which by the subsequent grant it expressly agreed it would not.

No case has ever held the affirmative.

See Roxbury v. Boston & P. R. Corp. 6 Cush. 424; Com. v. Essex Co. 13 Gray, 239; Fitchburg R. Co. v. Grand Junction R. & D. Co. 4 Allen, 198; Com. v. Eastern R. Co. 103 Mass. 254; Inland Fisheries Comrs. v. Holyoke Water Power Co. 104 Mass. 446, 6 Am. Rep. 247; Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 109 Mass. 108; Parker v. Metropolitan R. Co. 109 Mass. 506; Metropolitan R. Co. v. Highland Street R. Co. 118 Mass. 290; Thornton v. Marginal Freight R. Co. 123 Mass. 32.

As by the acts of the corporation under the charter the contract of the commonwealth that it would not revise or reduce tolls except as in the charter specifically provided had become executed, the right of the corporation to take toll as in the charter provided had become vested, and it could not be and was not intended to be taken away by the Act of 1874, which did not assume to repeal the charter or to make 22 L. R. A.

compensation for taking away the grant of tolls therein contained.

There is no difference between an act which applies to all persons except those who may be excluded from its operation, and an act which applies only to such persons as may be included within its operation. In either case the act is not, when it leaves the legislature, a completed act as to all persons to whom it applies, which is necessary to make it a valid exercise of the legislative power.

Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 17 Am. Rep. 425.

This act is special as much as an act applicable only to the respondent corporation alone, or to it, and to a portion of the other railroad corporations.

The act is in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and also of the constitution of the commonwealth.

It assumes to deprive the respondent of its property without compensation and without due process of law.

If the rate fixed by the legislature is not a reasonable rate, or if the question whether it is a reasonable rate cannot under the act of the legislature be inquired into, the act violates these provisions of the constitution.

An act which deprives a carrier of a reasonable rate of compensation for service performed takes its property as much as one which deprives it of its real estate.

Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970; Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339, 36 L. ed. 176; Stone v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. 116 U. S. 807, 29 L. ed. 636.

If, therefore, the Act of 1892 excludes inquiry as to whether the rate fixed by it for passenger transportation is a reduction of the rates fixed by the directors and of the earnings of the respondent therefrom, i. e., an inquiry as to whether the rate fixed by it is a reasonable rate, the act is plainly invalid.

Mercantile Trust Co. v. Texas & P. R. Co. 51 Fed. Rep. 529.

The act is not valid in this aspect as an exercise of the reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal the respondents' charter.

The reserved power to amend charters does not authorize any act which deprives the company of its property.

Detroit v. Detroit & H. Pl. Road Co. 43 Mich. 140.

The right to own and operate a railroad necessarily implies the right to charge a reasonable compensation for its use or for services performed by its use. No special grant of that right is necessary. Such a right would be implied from the rest of the charter if it was not specifically given.

Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 301, 329, 29 L. ed. 636, 643.

The act is invalid as a regulation of interstate commerce.

There is no case where a state statute, the requirements of which substantially affect the rates upon and the conduct of interstate transportation over the same line, has been sustained.

Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 32 L. ed. 352; Fiskien v. Shelby County Tax. Dist., 145 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 601.

The act is in violation of the provision of the United States constitution that "no state shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

It makes the obligation of one carrier a tender to another in payment of the debt due to it from a passenger for transportation.

The performance of transportation by a carrier creates a debt from the person transported to the carrier, and it is not competent for the legislature to provide that that debt can be discharged by the tender of the obligation of another carrier to perform similar service.

The legislature has just as much power to require that the cars and engines of the railroad itself shall be absolutely given for a promise or obligation to pay, as it has to require that the use of them, or the service performed by such use shall be given for such a promise or obligation.

It is only the use of the cars and engines which makes them valuable. The right to use and to receive compensation for use of anything is all that really makes it property.

The act is invalid as an absolute delegation of legislative power to the railroad commissioners.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 187, and citations.

"It may be that what the Legislature of 1879 proposed to accomplish would in itself work no hardship to respondent, and would be highly desirable to the city, but the principle violated is the fundamental principle that underlies all property, and the first successful inroad upon it that obtains judicial sanction may be a precedent that shall let in innumerable evils. Courts must look beyond the particular case to the governing principle, and be governed by that regardless of temporary and special inconveniences."

Detroit v. Detroit & H. Pl. Road Co. 43 Mich. 140, 149.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The brief for the Old Colony Railroad Company raises the questions whether the attorney-general has any right to bring the informations, and whether the court has any jurisdiction over the proceedings. It is said that Stat. 1892, chap. 389, does not give the court equity jurisdiction to enforce its provisions, but we do not regard these informations as informations in equity. They are rather petitions for a writ of mandamus. See Pub. Stat. chap. 186, § 18. It concerns the public, or an indefinite portion of the public, whether railroad corporations not exempted or excluded by the railroad commissioners shall obey Stat. 1892, chap. 389, and therefore we think that the attorney-general as representing the public can properly institute these proceedings. Atty. Gen. v. Boston, 123 Mass. 460.

At the hearing of the petition against the Old Colony Railroad Company the presiding justice excluded evidence against its objection "tending to prove the allegation of fact in the third, seventh, and eighth paragraphs of its answer." These paragraphs are as follows: "Third. The railroads thus operated by it [the defendant] are in the states of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and form connecting and continuous lines of interstate transportation and travel, and the regulation of the rates for and the conduct of passenger transportation thereon in this state substantially affect the rates for and the conduct of said interstate transportation thereon." "Seventh. It says that there are railroad corporations operating railroads in the commonwealth that are not pecuniarily responsible for the redemption and payment of tickets which may be issued by them under chapter 389 of the Acts of the year 1892. Eighth. It says that chapter 389 of the Acts of the year 1892, referred to in said information, is a reduction of its fares and tolls for passenger transportation established by its directors, and of its earnings therefrom, contrary to the provisions of its charter, and is not a revision or alteration of its fares and tolls in the manner prescribed thereby, or by the general law relating to railroad corporations."

Stat. 1892, chap. 389, can, we think, be construed as relating only to fares for the transportation of passengers from one point to another within the commonwealth; and if, under the existing regulations of the railroad company, there may be some difficulty in applying the law when a passenger intends to proceed from or to a point within the commonwealth to or from a point outside of the commonwealth, we do not see that this difficulty is inherent in the subject, or that by proper regulations the fares of passengers for transportation within the commonwealth cannot be paid for by mileage tickets, although the passengers are traveling to or from a place beyond the limits of the commonwealth. It is no sufficient objection to the statute that it may incidentally affect commerce between the states, if it does not attempt to regulate such commerce. See Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 133 U. S. 587, 33 L. ed. 784.

The averments of the seventh paragraph relate to a possibility, rather than a fact, because it is not alleged that any railroad corporations which are not pecuniarily responsible have issued any mileage tickets under Stat. 1892, chap. 389, or that all such corporations have not been excluded from the provisions of the statute by the railroad commissioners. It is, in effect, an argument by way of an example of what might happen if one railroad company is required to transport passengers on the credit of another. The constitutionality of the statute cannot depend upon the solvency or insolvency of any particular railroad company at any particular time.

The averments of the eighth paragraph are not to the effect that Stat. 1892, chap. 389, will, if carried into effect, operate to reduce the fares for passenger transportation below what is reasonable, but only that the statute will cause a reduction contrary to the provisions of the charter of the defendant. The Old Colony Railroad Company is a corporation in this commonwealth and in the state of Rhode Island, formed by the union of various railroad corporations chartered by this commonwealth or by the state of Rhode Island, and is also the lessee of the Boston & Providence Railroad Corporation and of other railroad corporations. The earliest charter of any of the railroads leased is that of the Boston & Providence Railroad Corporation, which was approved June 23, 1831. The earliest charter of any of the railroads which make up this defendant corporation is that of the Taunton Branch Railroad Corporation, which was approved April 7, 1835, being Stat. 1835, chap. 181. The fourth section of this last-named statute contains the provision 'that the legislature shall not at any time so reduce the tolls and their profits as to produce less than 10 per cent per annum upon the capital stock paid as aforesaid without the consent of said corporation.' The charters of other railroads which have been united to form the Old Colony Railroad Company contain similar provisions. These charters also grant to the corporations the right to take tolls at such rates as may be established by the directors. Similar provisions were enacted in the Revised Statutes (Rev. Stat. chap. 39, § 88), and in the General Statutes, Gen. Stat. chap. 63, § 112. Stat. 1870, chap. 825, § 1, repealed Gen. Stat. chap. 63, § 112, and provided as follows: "Any railroad corporation may establish for its sole benefit, fares, tolls, and charges, upon all passengers and property, conveyed or transported on its railroad, at such rates as may be determined by the directors thereof, and may from time to time by its directors regulate the use of its road: provided, that such rates of fares, tolls and charges, and regulations shall at all times be subject to revision and alteration by the legislature, or such officers or persons as the legislature may appoint for the purpose, anything in the charter of any such railroad corporation to the contrary notwithstanding." Stat. 1874, chap. 372, § 4, is as follows: "Railroad corporations heretofore established in this commonwealth, whether by special act or in conformity with the provisions of the general law passed in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two shall have the powers and privileges and be subject to the duties, liabilities, restrictions, and other provisions contained in this act; which, so far as inconsistent with charters granted since the eleventh day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one shall be deemed and taken to be in alteration and amendment thereof: provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair the validity of any special power heretofore conferred by charter or other special act upon any particular railroad corporation which has already exercised such power or to prevent the continued exercise thereof, conformably, so far as may be, to the provisions of this act; 22 L. R. A.

nor shall anything herein contained affect any act done or any right accruing, accrued or established, or any proceedings, doings, or acts ratified or confirmed, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any case before the act takes effect," etc. Section 179 of this Statute is as follows: "Any railroad corporation may establish for its sole benefit, fares, tolls, and charges upon all passengers and property, conveyed or transported on its railroad," at such rates as may be determined by the directors thereof, and may from time to time by its directors regulate the use of its road: provided, that such rates of fares, tolls, and charges, and regulations, shall at all times be subject to revision and alteration by the legislature, or such officers or persons as the legislature may appoint for the purpose, anything in the charter of any such railroad to the contrary notwithstanding." These provisions were re-enacted in Pub. Stat., chap. 112, §§ 2, 180. All the charters involved in these proceedings were granted subsequently to the passage of Stat. 1831, chap. 81, approved March 11, 1831, which provided "that the acts of incorporation which shall be passed after the passage of this act shall at all times hereafter be liable to be amended, altered or repealed at the pleasure of the legislature, and in the same manner as if an express provision to that effect were therein contained, unless there shall have been inserted in such act of incorporation an express limitation as to the duration of the same." Rev. Stat. chap. 44, § 28; Pub. Stat. chap. 105, § 3.

It is evident that the legislature, in the year 1870, and since, has attempted to repeal the special provisions of the early charters of railroads which purported to limit its right to reduce fares or tolls below 10 per cent of the cost of the roads. An examination of the statutes will show that since the year 1870 the Old Colony Railroad Company has accepted the benefit of legislation "subject to all general laws which now are or hereafter may be in force relating to railroad corporations." One instance mentioned in the brief of this company is the union of the company with the Boston, Clinton, Fitchburg & New Bedford Railroad Company, pursuant to Stat. 1882, chap. 80. The Boston, Clinton, Fitchburg & New Bedford Railroad Company was formed by the union of the other railroads. The Agricultural Branch Railroad Company was incorporated by Stat. 1847, chap. 269, and was subject "to all the duties, liabilities, and restrictions set forth in the forty-fourth chapter of the Revised Statutes, and in that part of the thirty-ninth chapter of the Revised Statutes relating to railroad corporations, and in the public statutes which have been or may be passed, relating to railroad corporations." The name of this railroad company was by chapter 153, Stat. 1867, changed to the Boston, Clinton & Fitchburg Railroad Company. The New Bedford Railroad Company was incorporated by Stat. 1873, chap. 20, "subject to all the restrictions, duties, and liabilities set forth in all the general laws which now are, or hereafter may be, in force relating to railroad corporations;" and this company, after it had purchased or united with the Taunton Branch Railroad Company, was authorized to unite "with the corporation that may be formed by the union of the Mansfield & Framingham Railroad Company with the Boston, Clinton & Fitchburg Railroad Company." None of these charters contains any provision that the tolls should not be reduced by the legislature below 10 per cent of the cost of the roads, or any provisions on the subject. It may at some time deserve consideration "whether, when a railroad voluntarily unites with other railroads, and there are special provisions concerning tolls in some of the charters and none in others, and the union is effected under a statute which provides that the corporation thus formed shall be subject to all general laws which now are or hereafter may be in force relating to railroad corporations, these special provisions continue in force, and are applicable to the consolidated corporation. In view of the many changes in the charters of nearly all the railroad corporations of the commonwealth occurring since 1870, which have been accepted by the corporations, it may well raise a doubt whether these corporations have not consented to be subject to any laws which the legislature under its general powers may constitutionally enact concerning fares or tolls. But whether these special provisions can be regarded as still in force, and, if so, whether they could be repealed by the legislature without the consent of the corporation, under the power reserved to amend, alter, or repeal the charters, we have not found it necessary to determine in the present cases. It is argued by both defendants that the statute is in violation of the provision of the Constitution of the United States, article 1, § 10, that "no state shall . . . make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." The meaning of the statute is, we think, that the delivery of a mileage ticket shall discharge the passenger from liability to the railroad for his transportation, but that the railroad issuing the ticket shall be liable to pay to the railroad transporting him, in lawful money, the statutory price of the ticket or part of a ticket which the passenger has surrendered. The intention is that the railroad performing the service shall ultimately be paid the statutory fare in lawful money, not that the ticket of itself shall be a legal tender. If the legislature cannot constitutionally require a railroad company to transport a passenger unless the fare is paid in advance, we have no doubt that the delivery of a mileage ticket issued by another corporation is not of itself a payment of the fare. We assume, however, in favor of the commonwealth, without deciding or expressing any opinion upon it, that it is not absolutely necessary that the fare of a passenger on a railroad be paid in advance in money.

There remain to be considered the objections of both defendants that the statute establishes a uniform rate per mile and requires one railroad company to transport a passenger upon the credit of another; that the conditions affecting the transportation imposed by the road which issues the tickets must be performed by any other road to which the ticket is presented unless the road is exempted or excluded from the provisions of the statute; and that authority is given to the railroad commissioners to exempt or exclude from the provisions of the statute any railroad if, in their judgment, the public welfare or the financial condition of the road requires or demands it. The legislature has prescribed the rate of fare per mile, but has not undertaken to prescribe in other respects the form of contract which each railroad may make for the transportation of passengers. It has not adopted a standard form of contract, as it has done, for example, with reference to fire insurance policies. Pub. Stat. chap. 119, § 139. One company may permit no baggage of any kind to be carried with the passenger on a mileage ticket, and another company may permit personal baggage or any baggage to an amount not exceeding 100 or 1,000 pounds in weight; and according to the terms of the first section of the statute one railroad must, on the presentation of a mileage ticket issued by another, perform the conditions of the contract as issued by the other. The power of the legislature of a state to prescribe the charge or the maximum charge to be made for the use of property "affected with the public interest" was first elaborately considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in what are called the "Granger Cases." Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94; Peik v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 94 U. S. 164, 24 L. ed. 97; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ackley, 94 U. S. 179, 24 L. ed. 99; Winona & St. P. R. Co. v. Blake, 94 U. S. 180, 24 L. ed. 99; Stone v. Wisconsin, 94 U. S. 181, 24 L. ed. 102. Whatever difference of opinion there may have been among the justices of that court concerning the tests which determine whether property is affected "with a public interest, there is no doubt that the property of railroad corporations which have been invested by the legislature with the right of eminent domain, and are common carriers of persons or merchandise, is property "devoted to a public use." See Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339, 36 L. ed. 176, and Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247. The justices of the Supreme Court of the United States perhaps differ in opinion whether there can be any judicial interference with the rates for railroad transportation established by the legislature of a state on the ground that they are not reasonable, but they agree that the property of railroads is property devoted to a public use, and that the legislature may establish rates, or reasonable rates, unless there is an express provision in the charter which forbids it. See Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970, and Budd v. New York, supra. In the railroad commission cases (Stone v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636; Stone v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 116 U. S. 347, 29 L. ed. 650; Stone v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. 116 U. S. 356, 29 L. ed. 652), a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States decided that a grant to a railroad company in its charter of the right to fix and regulate the tolls and charges, substantially such as are contained in the charters of the defendants in the present cases, does not deprive a state of its power to regulate rates. The court says: "It is now settled in this court that a state has power to limit the amount of charges by railroad companies for the transportation of persons and property within its own jurisdiction, unless restrained by some contract in the charter, or unless what is done amounts to a regulation of foreign or interstate commerce." The court held that a general power given to the corporation to establish rates is not such a contract as restrained the legislature from establishing what it deemed reasonable rates. See Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Miller, 132 U. S. 75, 33 L. ed. 267. It was also said that, "under pretence of regulating fares and freights, the state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons and property without reward; neither can it do that which in the law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or without due process of law." See Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 123 U. S. 174, 32 L. ed. 377; Dow v. Beidelman, 125 U. S. 680, 31 L. ed. 841; Ruggles v. Illinois, 108 U. S. 526, 27 L. ed. 812.

In Parker v. Metropolitan R. Co., 109 Mass. 506, the authority of the legislature of this commonwealth was maintained to fix the rate of toll to be paid by a street-railway company to the East Boston Ferry Company for the carriage of passengers in cars over the ferry. There was a provision in the charter of the ferry company that the company be allowed to collect and receive such tolls as the mayor and aldermen of Boston should determine, provided that "the rates of ferriage shall never be reduced so much as to reduce the yearly dividends of said company to an amount less than 8 per cent on the amount of the capital stock actually invested." The decision is put upon the ground that the statute fixing the rates is an amendment of the charter. The court says: "The power of regulating tolls upon ferries, barges, and turnpikes has been constantly exercised by the legislature. The great object of such corporations is the accommodation of public travel; and most, if not all, of the charters creating them contain provisions for the regulation of the tolls they are entitled to charge the public. The charter of the East Boston Ferry Company contains such provisions. The legislation in question is not upon a subject foreign to the provisions of the charter or the subject of the grant. It is strictly in alteration or amendment of such provisions, and it is designed to promote the chief object of the grant." It appears from the original papers in this case that the mayor and aldermen of Boston had fixed rates of toll over the ferry for foot passengers and for vehicles, but none expressly for horse cars, and that the rates fixed for foot passengers were twice or three times as much as those fixed in the statute for passengers in the horse cars. It also appeared that the established rates of toll were not sufficient to enable the company to pay "any dividends on the capital stock actually invested." The court did not, however, expressly consider whether the provision of the charter that the tolls should not be reduced "to an amount less than 8 per cent on the amount of capital stock actually invested" constituted a contract which could not be avoided except by a repeal of the charter. The statute there considered affected only the rates of toll for passengers in horse cars, leaving untouched all other rates. See Roxbury v. Boston & P. R. Corp. 6 Cush. 424; Massachusetts General Hospital v. State Mut. L. Assur. Co. 4 Gray, 227; Fitchburg R. Co. v. Grand Junction R. & D. Co. 4 Allen, 198; Com. v. Eastern R. Co. 103 Mass. 254, 4 Am. Rep. 555; Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 109 Mass. 108; Re Northampton, 158 Mass. 299.

It is conceded in the present cases, as we understand, that the legislature of a state, unless prevented by some contract, can constitutionally establish reasonable rates of fare for railroad companies within the state, and we regard it as settled that the legislature of a state having a constitution like that of Massachusetts can establish rates of fare for the transportation within the state of passengers and merchandise by railroad companies which are common carriers, unless the state is prevented by some contract with the railroad company; but it is not, however, yet settled what the limitations of this power are,—whether it is limited to such rates as a court may deem reasonable, or only to such rates as shall not operate to deprive the railroad companies of their property without just compensation, or without due process of law. It becomes, however, unnecessary at the present time to determine the limitations of this power, because it has not been contended in the present cases that the rates established by the statute are unreasonable. The legislature, if it sees fit, may establish rates for each railroad separately, and, as different railroads may reasonably require different rates, we see no objection to the statute on the ground that certain railroads may be exempted or excluded from its provisions. The subject is one upon which legislation need not be uniform, and the statute cannot be avoided by one railroad company because it is not applied to another. Re Northampton, supra. We think that the intention of the statute is that it shall apply to every railroad corporation operating a railroad for the common carriage of passengers within the commonwealth, unless the board of railroad commissioners shall determine on petition, after due hearing, that there is something exceptional in the financial condition of a particular railroad, or in the character of the service it renders to the public, which reasonably requires that railroad to be exempted or excluded from the provisions of the statute, leaving such a railroad to be specially dealt with by the legislature, if it should deem it necessary. We are not satisfied that the statute is unconstitutional on the ground that it contains a delegation of legislative power to the board of railroad commissioners.

The most formidable objections are that the statute authorizes one railroad to determine the conditions on which another railroad must carry passengers, and compels one railroad to carry passengers on the credit of another. We have been referred to no judicial decision where any such legislation has been considered. The law governing the taking of private property for public uses affords some analogies which we think are applicable to the present cases. The decisions of this court perhaps go as far as any in permitting an entry upon land and an occupation of it for the purpose of taking it for public uses before reasonable compensation has been actually made, and in not requiring that an adequate fund for compensation be set apart before the entry and occupation. Still there must be an adequate provision for compensation, and a provision that the land should be paid for out of the earnings of a railroad which was owned by the commonwealth was held not to be adequate, although it was probable that such earnings would be sufficient. Connecticut River R. Co. v. Franklin County Comrs. 127 Mass. 50, 84 Am. Rep. 888. But in the case of land, if the landowner takes proper measures to have the compensation determined, and it is not ultimately paid, a court of equity would enjoin the company taking it from the further use of the land, and the owner could retake the land, or enforce his lien upon it. "The power to take and the obligation to indemnify for the taking are inseparable." Brickett v. Haverhill Aqueduct Co. 142 Mass. 894; Drury v. Midland R. Co. 127 Mass. 571; Oushman v. Smith, 84 Me. 247; Richie v. Bar Harbor Water Co. 75 Me. 91. The statute authorizing the taking must contain some provision for obtaining adequate indemnity. It is not enough to leave the owner to his action at law for damages. "The duty of paying an adequate compensation for private property taken is inseparable from the exercise of the right of eminent domain. The act granting the power must provide for compensation, and a ready means of ascertaining the amount. Payment need not precede the seizure, but the means for securing indemnity must be such that the owner will be put to no risk or unreasonable delay." Haverhill Bridge Proprs. v. Essex County Comrs. 108 Mass. 120, 4 Am. Rep. 518; Thacher v. Dartmouth Bridge Co. 18 Pick. 501. If this is true when the property taken is land, much more is it true when the property taken is consumed in the use, so that, if compensation is not ultimately paid, the owner has no remedy by taking back the property. When property is taken for a public use, and is consumed in the use, the provision for adequate compensation certainly ought to be more than a mere right of action against a private person or corporation with the risk of never obtaining satisfaction; and the compensation, when it is made, must be made in money. Com. v. Peters, 2 Mass. 125; State v. Beackmo, 8 Blackf. 246; State v. Ravine Road Sewer Comrs. 89 N. J. L. 665; Vanhorne v. Dorrance, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 804, 1 L. ed. 391; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 691, 694; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 460.

Under the statutes of this commonwealth the compensation assessed for the taking of land by a railroad ultimately assumes the form of a judgment at law which must be satisfied in money, and it is provided that a "warrant of distress or execution may issue to compel the payment thereof with costs and interest, and all its right and authority to enter upon and use the land or property, except for making surveys, shall be suspended until such warrant or execution is satisfied." Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 101. At common law a common carrier of passengers could demand prepayment of the fare before he could be compelled to receive and transport passengers. The fare demanded must be reasonable, and when it is established by statute this is a legislative determination of what is reasonable. A carrier can have no lien on the passenger to secure the payment of the fare, and must of necessity collect the fare in advance, or trust to the credit of the passenger or of some other person. See Fitchburg R. Co. v. Gage, 12 Gray, 393; McDuffee v. Portland & R. R. Co. 53 N. H. 430, 18 Am. Rep. 72; Spofford v. Boston & M. R. 128 Mass. 826. Although, by reason of the public nature of the employment, the legislature can establish the rates of fare to be demanded by common carriers of passengers, we do not see that they can be compelled ultimately to take in payment anything which any other person could not be compelled to take in payment of a service rendered or in discharge of a debt. If a debt had been once incurred it could not be discharged except by a payment in money, or by the satisfaction of an execution by a levy upon tangible property. Although there may be little or no practical difficulty between solvent railroads if they choose to obey the statute, yet in theory each ticket or part of a ticket surrendered by a passenger for transportation represents a separate cause of action against the railroad issuing it. There is no fund provided for the redemption of the ticket, and no tangible property on which there is a lien. The statute puts no limit upon the number of mileage tickets which any railroad may issue, or upon the time within which they must be used. It does not prohibit a railroad from selling them for less than $20 each, although it must redeem them at that price. It is possible that a railroad in need of money might resort to enormous sales of such tickets as a mode of raising money, and that these tickets might remain outstanding, to be used on other roads indefinitely, and that many of them might be presented for redemption at some remote time in the future, when the railroad company issuing them might be unable to redeem them. If it be assumed that under the power to regulate the fares of common carriers of passengers the legislature can require the passengers to be carried before the fares have been actually paid in money, the security for the ultimate payment of the fares in money ought, we think, to be as certain as that required when private property is taken for public uses, and we are of opinion that this statute does not provide adequate security. The objection that the statute authorizes one railroad to make conditions concerning the transportation of passengers which must be performed by other railroads also seems to us valid. The objection is not that the legislature has itself attempted to declare the rights of passengers who have purchased mileage tickets. The legislature, by this statute, has not determined the conditions which shall be incident to the carriage of passengers under these tickets; nor has it left them to be determined by the railroad company transporting the passengers. One railroad is, in effect, authorized to make a contract for another, but the railroads are not in fact the agents of each other in issuing these tickets. It has been often said that the legislature cannot make a contract between two or more persons which they do not choose to make, although it may sometimes impose duties which can be enforced as if they arose from contract. Without denying the power of the legislature to determine the form of the contracts which common carriers of persons or merchandise must make concerning transportation, and without considering the authority of the legislature to delegate this power to a board of public officers, we are of opinion that this power cannot be delegated to private persons or corporations.

It is not necessary or practicable to attempt in these cases to determine just how far the legislature may go by way of regulating the business of railroad companies within the commonwealth, nor just where the limits of its power end, nor whether certain provisions of the statute, if taken alone, would be valid. The statute must be considered as a whole. The statute requires a railroad company to transport passengers, and to receive therefor tickets or coupons which merely give separate causes of action against another railroad company, and no security is provided that these tickets or coupons will be redeemed in money by the railroad company issuing them when presented for redemption, and they may be used for transportation long after they are issued. The company issuing tickets may impose upon other railroads duties and responsibilities in the carriage of passengers different from those it assumes towards passengers who purchase tickets of itself, and the tickets may be used indiscriminately upon all railroads within the commonwealth not excluded or exempted from the provisions of the statute, and are not confined to railroad companies engaged in transporting passengers in connection with the company issuing the tickets. The railroad commissioners may exercise their power of excluding a railroad company from the provisions of the statute in season to prevent loss from a failure of the company to redeem the tickets issued, or they may not. The rights of railroad companies ultimately to receive in money the fares of passengers ought not to depend upon the discretion of the railroad commissioners, and, if the statute would be invalid but for this discretion, this provision would not make it valid.

Mr. Justice Lathrop and Mr. Justice Barker agree that the informations are rightfully brought by the attorney-general, and that the court has jurisdiction, and are of opinion that the necessary effect of the statute is to apply and appropriate individual property to the public use, without the owner's consent, and without legal provision for a reasonable compensation therefor; and for this reason they agree that the statute is void without expressing an opinion upon the other matters discussed in this opinion. A majority of the court are of opinion that the petitions should be dismissed.

Knowlton, J., dissenting:

I concur in everything contained in the opinion of the chief justice, except the discussion of the two points on which the decision is made to turn, but I do not agree with him in that, and I do not think the statute unconstitutional. In the opinion the question whether the statute is void as impairing the obligation of contracts contained in the several charters under which the railroads were organized was somewhat considered, but not decided. In the view which I take of other parts of the case, it becomes necessary to consider this question further. I need not go over the ground traversed by the chief justice. It is obvious that the object of the Statutes of 1831, chap. 81 (Rev. Stat. chap. 44, § 23), was to prevent charters afterwards granted by the legislature from being held to be contracts; and all subsequent charters must be deemed to have been granted subject to that general law, except in cases where the legislature saw fit plainly to abrogate it. If a charter was afterwards granted which expressly professes to bind the commonwealth by a contract, doubtless the commonwealth is bound; but in interpreting subsequent charters this general law must be given effect so far as it can be without coming in direct conflict with express contracts, plainly intended as such by the legislature. If we assume that in some of the charters of railroad corporations now included in the Old Colony Railroad Company there was an express contract that the legislature should not reduce the fares and charges so as to leave an income of less than 10 per cent on the cost of the railroad, and that the general law above cited does not apply to these contracts so far as they have been executed on either side, it must still be held that the legislature could at any time amend or repeal these provisions of the charters so as to prevent future action on the faith of them, leaving them in effect only so far as rights had accrued by the execution of them. It would be very unreasonable to hold that by such a provision the legislature was bound for all time to allow rates and charges which would produce an income of 10 per cent, not only on the cost of the railroad as first built and completed under the charter, but also on every extension, enlargement, or improvement of it after it had been completed according to the original plan. By the Statutes of 1870 (chap. 325, § 1), re-enacted in the Statutes of 1874 (chap. 372, §§ 4, 174), which last sections are still in force, the legislature terminated the right of these railroad corporations to go on expending money and increasing the cost of their railroads under a contract which permitted them, without the possibility of legislative interference, to charge fares which would give them an income of 10 per cent on the cost of the road, if such a right had previously existed. As I understand the report, the Old Colony Railroad Company did not contend at the hearing that the statute under consideration would reduce its income below 10 per cent on the cost of the road at the time its right to build a road or to increase the cost of it under the provisions of the original charters was terminated by the Statutes of 1870. Moreover, I am of opinion that the Old Colony Railroad Company, by accepting the benefit of legislation, subject to general laws which gave the legislature the right to revise its fares, rates, and charges, has lost the right, if it ever had it, to interpose the provisions of the original charters against a statute which assumes in a reasonable way to regulate or reduce its fares. In the suit against the Boston & Albany Railroad Company nothing appears in the record which opens this defense, or requires considerations of the numerous statutes under which the corporation is acting. I am therefore of opinion that the petitions should not be dismissed on the ground that the statute impairs the obligation of contracts securing to the respondent immunity from reduction of fares.

The only grounds on which the statute is held unconstitutional by the majority of the court are: First, that it seeks to compel the transportation of passengers by one railroad on the credit of another, to which the money for payment of the fare has been advanced by the purchaser of a mileage ticket; and, secondly, that a mileage ticket is to be "accepted and received for fare and passage" upon other railroads "under like conditions as upon the line or lines of the corporation issuing such ticket." The property of railroad corporations is devoted to a public use. The truth of this proposition is nowhere questioned. Such corporations may exercise the right of eminent domain by taking lands for their roads against the will of the owners. The business of providing highways and arranging conveniences to enable people easily to pass from place to place is a part of the public business which may be done by the state. If the state grants franchises and delegates the transaction of this business to corporations, it retains the right to regulate the business for the public good in any reasonable way. It may do this in the exercise of the police power, which is a power inherent in every well-ordered system of government. It is the power which is granted in terms to our legislature by article 4, chap. 1, of the Constitution of Massachusetts, which gives the general court full power and authority "from time to time to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without, so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this commonwealth, and for the government and order thereof and the subjects of the same, and for the necessary support and defense of the government thereof," etc. Moreover, most of the charters of railroad corporations have been granted and accepted subject to a reserved right in the legislature to alter or repeal them. It is settled that this right to regulate the business of railroad corporations extends so far as to authorize the legislature to fix the rates and charges for the transportation of passengers and freight. The principle is established by decisions, not only of this court, and of the Supreme Court of the United States, but of courts in most of the other states. Parker v. Metropolitan R. Co. 62 Miss. 607-639, 52 Am. Rep. 198. A minority of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States dissent from decisions of the majority extending the doctrine to the regulation of charges for the use of grain elevators (Munn v. Illinois, supra; Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517-549, 36 L. ed. 247, 257), making a distinction between what they consider a public use of property and a public interest in the use of property. But they agree with the majority that railroad corporations are subject to regulation. Mr. Justice Field, one of this minority, in giving the opinion of the court in Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174-179, 32 L. ed. 877-880, says: "The incorporation of the company, by which numerous parties are permitted to act as a single body for the purposes of its creation, or, as Chief Justice Marshall expresses it, 'by which the character and properties of individuality' are bestowed 'on a collective and changing body of men' (Providence Bank v. Billings, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 514-562, 7 L. ed. 939-956), the grant to it of special privileges to carry out the object of its incorporation, particularly the authority to exercise the state's right of eminent domain, that it may appropriate needed property,—a right which can be exercised only for public purposes,—and the obligation assumed by the acceptance of its charter to transport all persons and merchandise upon like conditions and upon reasonable rates, affected the property and employment with a public use; and where property is thus affected, the business in which it is used is subject to legislative control. So long as the use is continuous, the power to regulate remains, and the regulation may extend not merely to provisions for the security of passengers and freight and against accidents, and for the convenience of the public, but also to prevent extortion by unreasonable charges, and favoritism by unjust discrimination. This is not a new doctrine, but old doctrine, always asserted whenever property or business is, by reason of special privileges received from the government the better to secure the purposes to which the property is dedicated or devoted, affected with a public use." In Budd v. New York, supra, Mr. Justice Brewer, another of this minority, says: "The use is public, because the public may create it, and the individual creating it is doing thereby, pro tanto, the work of the state. The creation of all highways is a public duty. Railroads are highways. The state may build them. If an individual does that work, he is pro tanto doing the work of the state. He devotes his property to a public use. It does not lose the right to fix the price because an individual voluntarily undertakes to do the work." This is equivalent to saying—that is undoubtedly the law—that it does not lose the right to make any reasonable regulation for the benefit of the public in regard to the transaction of any or of all the railroad business in the state.

The legislature's determination of what is reasonable is also conclusive, subject only to the limitations that its enactment shall not conflict with any expressed or implied provisions of the constitution, either of the state or of the United States. I am not aware of anything in either constitution which forbids the state in regulating the public business of transporting passengers within its borders, when the business is carried on by its own creatures, whose financial ability it is supposed to know, from requiring these corporations to issue tickets which, when paid for, shall be received for transportation on a line of railroad other than that issuing it, and which shall entitle the carrying railroad to receive its pay from the railroad which issued and sold the ticket. It seems to me plain that this is not within the express provision of our state constitution which forbids the taking of private property without compensation, or for other than a public use. I think it is not a taking of property without due process of law, within the meaning of that language in the constitution of the United States, nor an interference with the right "of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property" which is secured by the declaration of rights in the constitution of Massachusetts. It is merely a regulation of public business which the legislature has a right to regulate. Its apparent object is to promote the convenience of persons having occasion to travel on different railroads, and to reduce for them the cost of transportation.

The risk of pecuniary loss to a corporation from carrying a passenger on the credit of another corporation to which the money has been advanced for carriage, instead of having payment at the time, is almost infinitesimal. In the first place, all railroad corporations are required to make annual reports to the commonwealth (Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 81), and the legislature is presumed to know that all, or nearly all, of them are of ample financial ability, and that their obligation to pay a small debt is as good as that of any city or town in the state; secondly, if there are any now, or if hereafter there should be, any which are not financially sound, it would be the duty of the railroad commissioners, on application, to relieve all other corporations from the obligation to take their tickets. In the natural course of business there would be frequent settlements of accounts between the different railroads, as there are now, and the most that any railroad could owe another under this statute would be the difference between the cost of the other's mileage tickets held by itself and the cost of its own tickets held by the other, which would ordinarily be but a trifling sum. It would be impossible for any railroad to harm its neighbors by issuing and selling a large number of mileage tickets in the anticipation of becoming insolvent, for, if it were possible to sell them, the railroad commissioners, at any time, on application, would exclude it from the provision of the act, and other railroads could not afterwards be required to accept its mileage tickets; and the loss, if any, would fall on the purchasers of the tickets, whose contracts would be with it alone. The risk of loss from inability of one railroad to collect of another under mileage tickets taken from passengers seems to me too small to be seriously considered, and I regard the objections to the statute in this particular as theoretical and speculative, rather than substantial or practical. It is a matter of common knowledge that every railroad does business on the credit of other railroads to a much larger amount than would ever be done under a statute of this kind. But, suppose there is a possibility of trifling loss in a case which might arise under the statute, that does not render the statute unconstitutional. The question is rather whether there is a probability of losses so large as to make such a requirement plainly unjust and unreasonable as an interference with "the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property." I think nobody can contend that there is such a probability. Moreover, the very idea of the exercise of the police power necessarily implies a greater or less interference with the acquisition, use, and enjoyment of property. Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 239, 49 Am. Rep. 27; Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 10 L. R. A. 116. Every statute affecting property, enacted in the exercise of this power, illustrates the proposition. The reduction by the legislature of fares upon railroads is an illustration which, in my opinion, touches much more closely the acquisition, possession, and protection of property than does a requirement that railroads shall trust each other during short intervals for the payment of fares for which interchangeable tickets have been taken. In determining whether the statute is so unreasonable as to be against common right, real conditions and probable results, and not remote possibilities, are to be considered. It will hardly be contended that every statute enacted for the regulation of the railroad business of the commonwealth which contemplates the giving of a short credit by one railroad company to another in the convenient transaction of their business is, for that reason, unconstitutional. There are many general and special laws which require railroads to render services, to furnish station accommodations, and permit the use of tracks and the like to another corporation for a reasonable compensation, to be agreed upon, or, in the absence of agreement, to be fixed by the railroad commissioners. In many cases it would be difficult, if not impracticable, to provide for these payments in advance, and some, at least, of the statutes seem to contemplate that payments will be made upon short credits, as the practice is, after the services are rendered or the benefits received. Pub. Stat. chap. 113, §§ 216-218; Stat. 1866, chap. 126; Stat. 1872, chap. 180; Stat. 1871, chap. 348. Some of these statutes require the payment of rent for the use of a station built and owned by one railroad and used by others. The rent must either be paid in advance, or there must be some credit for it; it could hardly be paid daily. A requirement that the rent should be paid in advance would be quite as objectionable on constitutional grounds as a provision for a reasonable credit. The building might be destroyed, and the company that had paid rent in advance might get no equivalent for its payment. It seems to me that a regulation which may require a short credit for trifling sums, arising in the regular course of business between great corporations, most of which have property amounting to many millions of dollars in value, is not for that reason unconstitutional.

Similar considerations apply to the objection that the tickets are to be received by the different railroads in the state under like conditions. It may be that in favor of the constitutionality of the law this language might be construed to mean something less than that the provisions of a contract in regard to the amount of baggage which may be carried, and the like, made by the railroad issuing the ticket, are to be applicable when the ticket is used on the railroad of another company; but if we assume in favor of the respondents that this is the meaning of the language, the difficulty does not seem to me to be great. In the first place, it is a familiar fact that upon railroads generally there is no such difference in their contracts as to create any practical difficulty in issuing tickets to be used over many different lines of connecting railroads. Everybody knows that one may buy, at any important railroad station in the state, a ticket to go thousands of miles over numerous railroads, whose owners will all receive the ticket under like terms and conditions. The reasonableness and constitutionality of the statute are to be determined in view of the existing facts in the management of railroad business, and not in view of the legal possibility that some corporation would insert in its mileage ticket an unusual or absurd provision. If such an unexpected event should occur, that would be a reason for the intervention of the railroad commissioners under the statute, to relieve other corporations by excluding or exempting the railroad from the provisions of the act, and it would be in the power of the legislature at the earliest opportunity to compel it to issue mileage tickets with reasonable provisions in regard to the transportation of baggage and other similar matters. No material harm could come to any person or corporation in the mean time. In view of the way in which railroad corporations do their business, which must be presumed to have been known to the legislature, and which must be considered in passing upon the statute, this objection, like the other, seems to me speculative and theoretical, rather than real. The statute in these two particulars, which are now made the ground of objection to it, conforms to the well-known voluntary practice of railroad corporations in the transaction of similar business. These objections would seem to be removable by a provision that each corporation shall deposit with the state treasurer, or with some other responsible officer, a sufficient fund to guarantee the redemption of all mileage tickets issued by it, and by a requirement that all mileage tickets shall be in a form prescribed by the legislature; but, if the statute contained such provisions, is it probable that the people of the commonwealth or the railroad corporations would think it more reasonable, or better for practical operation, or more conducive to the best interests of the community? I am of opinion that the statute is a regulation of the business of the railroad corporations of the commonwealth, which does not involve such probable loss from carrying passengers on credit, or such practical difficulty from the terms and conditions on which tickets would be issued, as to be an interference with the rights of those who undertake to do this public business, and I therefore think the statute constitutional. I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Holmes concurs in this opinion.

or absolute right generally reserved in bills of rights, but its possession is dependent upon constitutional or statutory grant. Subject to the limitations contained in the Federal Constitution such right is under the control of the sovereign power of the state, and where the constitution has conferred the right and prescribed the qualifications of electors, the legislature cannot change or add to them in any way; but where the constitution does not confer the right to vote or

NOTE.—The control of the legislature over municipal elections which, in one phase of it as touching the right of women to vote, is discussed in the recent case of Coffin v. Thompson (Mich.) 21 L. R. 22 L. R. A.

A. 662, and note, is in the present case very extensively discussed in its whole scope, and the elaborate opinion and briefs very fully present the law on that subject.

prescribe the qualifications of voters, it is competent for the legislature, as the representative of the law-making power of the state, to do so.

2. Section 1 of Article 6 of the Constitution of 1885, prescribing the qualifications of electors at all elections under it, does not apply to elections for municipal officers in this state, but such elections are subject to statutory regulation, and it is competent for the legislature to prescribe the qualifications of voters at the same.

3. The provision in the third section of chapter 4301 of the Laws of 1893 (being "An Act to Fix the Number and Provide for the Election of the Municipal Officers of the City of Jacksonville, a Municipal Corporation Existing in Duval County, Florida, and to Prescribe Their Terms of Office, and Regulate Their Compensation,") that those persons who, at the time of the holding of any city election, are residents of the city, and who, at the time of the general state election held next preceding, were qualified electors of any of the election districts within said city, shall constitute the qualified electors of said city authorized to vote at such city election, is not in conflict with the general provisions of the criminal law disqualifying persons convicted of certain crimes from voting at any election, and the two can and must be construed in harmony with each other.

4. The Legislature having the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters at municipal elections, may provide the means of ascertaining the persons who possess the qualifications prescribed, and although the action of a ministerial board in ascertaining the qualifications of those given the right to vote may not be given a conclusive effect on the voter's right to cast his ballot, yet an election held under a statute with a provision making the action of such a board, in this respect, conclusive, will not, on this account alone, be set aside, in the absence of any showing that voters were deprived by the action of such board of any rights conferred by the statute.

5. The provision in section 6 of Article 6 of the Constitution, that in all elections by the people the vote shall be by ballot, applies to municipal elections.

6. It is competent for the legislature to prescribe an official ballot, and prohibit the use of any other, and it may also provide for printing the names of candidates regularly nominated by a convention or mass-meeting, or who run as independents, but it cannot restrict the elector to voting for some one of the candidates whose names are printed upon the official ballot. The constitution guarantees to him the right to vote for whom he pleases.

7. The provisions in reference to voting, in the municipal act supra,—Held, to restrict the voter at municipal elections in the city of Jacksonville for municipal officers, to vote for some one of the candidates whose names are printed upon the official ballot, and to this extent the act is unconstitutional.

8. Where unconstitutional provisions in a statute can be separated from the valid portions, and the legislative purpose expressed in so much as is good can be accomplished independently of the void part, and considering the entire act, the good and the bad features are not so essentially and inseparably connected in substance, or so interdependent as that it cannot be said that the legislature would not have passed the one without enacting the other, it is the duty of the court to give effect to so much as is good.

9. In the application of the foregoing rule it was held that the rejection of the feature of the municipal act in question restricting the voter to some one of the candidates whose names were printed on the official ballot, did not affect the valid portions of the act, and that an election authorized by it will not be set aside on an attack solely on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the act, and in the absence of affirmative showing that the result would have been different had the illegal portion not existed.

10. The provision in the 3d section of the Act, supra, "that prior to the holding of the first city election as provided herein, there shall be given to each person who was entitled to qualify himself as an elector at the last state election by registration and the payment of his poll taxes for the years 1890 and 1891, and failed to do so, an opportunity to qualify by registering and himself paying his own poll taxes for such years," did not deprive the voter of his right to pay his said poll taxes through an authorized agent, and a payment made through such agent would be a valid payment under the principle, qui facit per alium facit per se.

11. The provisions of the act relating to paying the poll taxes mentioned had reference to the poll taxes due under the General Revenue Law for the years 1890 and 1891, and if no poll taxes were due for said years as required by that law, none were required under the municipal act in question as a prerequisite to the right to vote in the city election held in July, 1893.

12. The legislature has the power under the constitution to make the payment of a capitation tax, not exceeding one dollar a year, a prerequisite for voting, and there is no constitutional limitation against the right to require the payment in any one year of delinquent capitation taxes as a prerequisite to the right to vote, provided such taxes do not amount to more than one dollar for each year.

13. The reasonableness or justice of a deliberate act of the legislature, so long as it does not contravene some portion of the organic law, is a matter for legislative consideration, and not subject to judicial control.

14. The election commissioners named in the fifth section of the act, supra, to prepare for, hold, and declare the result of the municipal election held in July, 1893, are not officers within the meaning of section 27 of Article 3 of the Constitution of 1885, nor are they officers in any sense, but constituted a temporary board for the performance of certain duties in reference to the holding of an election, and their appointment or designation was not necessarily or essentially executive in its nature.

ON DEMURRER to an information in the nature of a quo warranto to ascertain by what right defendants claimed the office of councilmen of the City of Jacksonville. Sustained.

Statement by Mabry, J.:

An information in the nature of a quo warranto was filed by the attorney-general, on behalf of the people of the state of Florida, in this court on the 17th day of October, A. D. 1893, against the defendants, Benjamin F. Dillon and twelve others, alleging in effect that they, without right or legal warrant, have usurped and still do usurp the offices of councilmen of the city of Jacksonville. It is alleged in the information that Thomas W. Roby and sixteen others named were duly appointed by the governor of the state of Florida to be councilmen for the various wards of said city, under and by virtue of the Act of the legislature approved May 16, 1889, entitled "An Act to Amend an Act Entitled an Act to Establish the Municipality of Jacksonville, Provide for Its Government and Prescribe Its Jurisdiction and Powers, Approved May 31, 1887," and that they qualified by taking the oath of office prescribed by law, were duly commissioned as such councilmen, and thereupon entered upon and performed the duties of said offices and exercised the rights, benefits, and privileges thereof, until the same were usurped by the defendants.

Thomas W. Roby and the sixteen persons named, it is alleged, constitute the city council of said city, and are still entitled to use, exercise, and enjoy the offices of councilmen of said city.

It is further related that the defendants, Dillon and the twelve others mentioned, for the space of eighty days last past, and more, without legal warrant, grant, or right whatever, have used and exercised, and still do use and exercise, the offices of councilmen of said city, and that they have claimed and still do claim to be councilmen of said city, and to have the right to use and enjoy all the liberties, privileges, and franchises belonging and appertaining to said offices of city councilmen, but that said offices, liberties, and franchises, during the whole of said time, have been and still are usurped by them, against the people of the state of Florida.

The information proceeds with the allegations that the claims of the said defendants to the offices in question are based upon the pretense that they were elected to the same at an election for municipal officers pretended to be held in and for the said city of Jacksonville on the 18th day of July, 1893, by virtue of an Act of the legislature of Florida, approved May 16, 1893, being chapter 4301, Laws of Florida. This election, and the act under which it was held, are alleged to be invalid, void, and in violation of the constitution of the state of Florida, in this, that at said election, by the terms of the act, a considerable number of the inhabitants and citizens of said city, to whom the constitution guaranteed the right of suffrage at the time of said election, were denied the right to vote and participate therein, the excluded classes under said act being enumerated under the following heads: First, all male persons residents of said city at the time of said city election possessing the constitutional qualifications of electors, but who at the time of the general state election held next preceding said city election were not qualified electors by reason only of not having attained the age of twenty-one years; second, all male persons residents of said city at the time of said city election possessing all the qualifications of electors, but who at the time of the general state election held next preceding said city election, were not qualified electors by reason only of not having resided and had their domicile, home, and place of permanent abode in the state of Florida for one year at the time limited for registration for such election; third, all male persons residents of said city at the time of said city election possessing all the constitutional qualifications of electors, but who at the time of the general state election held next preceding the said city election, were not qualified electors by reason only of not having resided and had their habitation, domicile, home, and place of permanent abode in the county of their then residence for six months, at the time limited for registration for said election; fourth, all male persons residents of said city at the time of said election who at the time of the general state election held next preceding said city election, and at the time of said city election, possessed all the constitutional qualifications of electors, but were not electors of any of the election districts of said city at the time of said state election.

It is further alleged that the act under which said election was held is unconstitutional for the reason that by its terms only those persons were allowed to vote whose names appear on the registration lists, after the same had been revised by the persons named in the act as election commissioners, without regard to registration in fact, and that by the terms of said act persons were allowed to vote at said city election who were qualified electors at the general state election held next prior thereto, but who had afterwards lost their domicile in the state, and county of Duval, and had not regained the same in time to become an elector at the time of said city election under the provisions of the constitution; and also that at said election by the terms of said act the qualified electors of said city of Jacksonville were not permitted to vote for whom they pleased, but were restricted in the right of suffrage to vote for such person or persons whose names were placed upon an "official ballot" by the election commissioners named in the act.

The foregoing are the grounds specially alleged in the information impeaching the validity of the Act of 1893, chapter 4301, under which the election was held.

The defendants, other than Walter F. Coachman, moved to quash the writ of quo warranto, and this motion has been treated here as a demurrer to the information. Among the grounds of this motion are the following: That said information shows upon its face that the defendants have not exercised, and are not now exercising, the offices of councilmen of the city of Jacksonville, in the county of Duval, state of Florida, without legal warrant, grant, or right; that said writ shows upon its face that defendants use and exercise the office of councilmen of the city of Jacksonville under and by virtue of an election held on the 18th day of July, A. D. 1898, under the provisions of an act of the legislature passed in accordance with the provisions of the constitution, and approved by the governor on May 16, 1898, at which said election they received a majority of all the votes cast; that the constitution of the state of Florida does not guarantee the right of suffrage to any inhabitant or citizen of the city of Jacksonville, or any other city, at a municipal election; that section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution of Florida does not fix the qualifications of voters in municipal elections, but is limited by its express terms to elections for state and county officers provided for in the constitution; and that the constitution of the state of Florida does not prohibit, either in express terms, or by necessary implication, the legislature from restricting the voters in any municipal election to voting for such person or persons as had procured their names to be placed upon an official ballot, as provided in chapter 4801 of the Laws of Florida. There are other grounds of the motion that need not be set out here, as the above present the controlling questions in the case for our decision.

Mr. H. Bisbee, for relator:

Registration is not one of the qualifications of an elector.

It is a mode of proving to the election officers the qualifications of the elector, but it is not the only mode of proving it.

Section 2, article 6, of the Constitution commands the Legislature to provide for registration of "all the legally qualified voters in each county."

It must follow that the legislature when it legislates upon the subject of registration, must provide ample facilities for registration for every qualified voter.

The act in question, to the extent that it makes registration a prerequisite for voting at the city election held in July last, and then excludes certain classes of persons from the right to register, and from the right to vote at such election, is unconstitutional.

(a) Because the act discriminates, without any reason, in that it allows the exercise of the elective franchise to certain classes of citizens and takes it away from other classes.

A statute which increased the period of residence above the constitutional period, as a qualification for a voter at a municipal election, is unconstitutional and void.

Furr, supra*.

The constitutionality of a statute depends upon its operation and effect and not upon the form it may be made to assume.

State v. Hipp, 38 Ohio St. 199.

It is one of the peculiar characteristics of our free institutions, that every citizen is permitted to enjoy certain rights and privileges which place him upon an equality with his neighbors. Any law which takes away or abridges these rights or suspends their exercise, is not only an infringement upon this enjoyment, but an actual punishment.

Green v. Shumway, 39 N. Y. 421.

(b) It is unconstitutional because it charges and adds to the qualifications of an elector prescribed by the constitution.

The fundamental and all-pervading idea of election is that the question to be voted upon shall be submitted to the body of electors without discrimination.

Madison County Ct. v. People, 58 Ill. 456.

When the legislature confers upon a city the right of self government and of electing its officers, it must conform to other provisions of the constitution and preserve the rule of equality before the law, and not discriminate in the exercise of the elective franchise or any other constitutional right.

State v. Constantine, 42 Ohio St. 487, 51 Am. Rep. 888; Atty-Gen. v. Detroit, 58 Mich. 216, 55 Am. Rep. 675.

The intention of the framers of the constitution was to prescribe the qualifications for all voters in the state, and that these qualifications should apply to all elections, as well as to the election of officers created by the constitution as to the election of officers, state, county, and municipal, created by an act of the legislature.

The election of a municipal officer created by the legislature is as much an election under the constitution as the election of any officer for a county created by a statute or an officer created by the constitution.

State v. Constantine, supra; People v. English, 15 L. R. A. 181, 189 Ill. 622.

Constitutional qualifications for electors apply to city and town elections and elections other than for state and county officers.

Rep. 675; Com. v. McClelland, 88 Ky. 686.

The provision in section 3, where it requires registration and payment of poll tax in person for the years 1890 and 1891, and that this should be done more than two weeks before the said first city election, is also unconstitutional and void.

McCrary, Elections, § 28.

The requirement of registration for more than two weeks before the election was calculated to subvert, injuriously, unreasonably, and unnecessarily restrain, impair, and impede the right to vote.

Daggett v. Hudson, 48 Ohio St. 548, 54 Am. Rep. 832; Dells v. Kennedy, 49 Wis. 555, 85 Am. Rep. 786; White v. Multnomah County Comrs. 18 Or. 817, 54 Am. Rep. 843, note; Kinneen v. Wells, 144 Mass. 497, 59 Am. Rep. 105.

It was unreasonable to require the payment of any poll tax two weeks before the election.

It was unreasonable to require the voter to pay poll taxes for the years 1890 and 1891.

The act is unconstitutional because it imposes the payment of two capitation taxes as a prerequisite for voting.

The law prohibits the receiving of a vote from any person whose name does not appear on the list of electors, for the ward in which he offers to vote.

The Legislature cannot legally pass such a law. There should have been a provision in the statute by which a voter could prove his qualifications and that he has been registered and his name improperly omitted.

State v. Adams, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 288; State v. Jefferson County Comrs. 17 Fla. 715; Dells v. Kennedy, 49 Wis. 555, 85 Am. Rep. 786; White v. Multnomah County Comrs. supra; State v. Staten, 6 Coldw. 284.

That feature of the statute which compels an elector to vote for some candidate placed before the people in the manner prescribed by the statute; or in case of such candidate's death or resignation, for such candidate as a committee may substitute, cannot be upheld.

The law permits the right to vote on the part of persons who are not qualified voters under the constitution of the state.

Residence in the city at the time of the last state election and not residence at the time of the said city election, qualifies one to vote in respect to residence. Description of those entitled excludes all others.

Washington v. State, 75 Ala. 582, 51 Am. Rep. 479; McCafferty v. Guyer, 59 Pa. 109; Brightly, Election Cases, 47.

Authorizing persons to vote by this form of legislation, who do not possess the constitutional qualifications of electors is repugnant to sections 4 and 5 of article 6 of the Constitution.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 218.

Any law prohibiting a portion of qualified electors from voting at a given election, as well as the conduct of the constituted authorities conducting the election, that deprives a portion of the voters of the power to vote, makes the election void.

Lim. 6th ed. p. 775.

In 1892 there was no law authorizing any citizen to vote for municipal officers in the city of Jacksonville, and consequently no law requiring him to pay poll taxes as a prerequisite for voting at any such city election. Therefore the Act of 1893 imposing a penalty upon a citizen of Jacksonville because he did not register in 1892 is unequal, obnoxious, and unconstitutional.

Mr. William B. Lamar, Atty-Gen., also for relator.

Messrs. Young & Barra, for defendant:

There is no natural right to vote.

United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 543, 23 L. ed. 598; Frissleben v. Shallockross (Del. Err. & App.) 8 L. R. A. 337.

The constitution of a state is a limitation upon and not a grant of power to, the legislature, and the question as to who shall have the right of suffrage and the time, place, and manner of exercising it when not expressly prohibited by the terms of the constitution, are within the power of the legislature.

State v. Black, 16 L. R. A. 769, 54 N. J. L. 456; Morrison v. Springer, 15 Iowa, 804; Ex parte Wells, 21 Fla. 318.

It is thus the duty of the legislature to regulate the exercise of the elective franchise, and the constitutionality of such legislation cannot be denied so long as it merely regulates and does not deny the franchise itself.

De Walt v. Bartley, 15 L. R. A. 771, 146 Pa. 529; Detroit v. Rush, 10 L. R. A. 171, 82 Mich. 532.

The legislature must determine for each municipality the power it should exercise and the capacities it should possess, and what restriction should be placed upon it. Limitations upon the power of the state over municipal corporations do not exist unless found in the constitution of the state.

Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 66; Ex parte Wells, supra.

Messrs. A. W. Cockrell & Son, also for defendant:

To justify the courts in pronouncing a statute void, it must be violative of some constitutional provision, state or federal, or must be an attempted exercise of power not legislative in character or of power committed to some other department of the government.

Darman v. State, 34 Ala. 216; Winter v. Montgomery, 65 Ala. 408.

It is only at elections which the constitution itself requires to be held, or which the legislature under the mandate of the constitution makes provision for, that persons having the qualifications set forth in said section 1 of article 6 are by the constitution declared to be qualified electors and guaranteed the right of suffrage.

The constitution is silent upon the subject of the election of municipal officers.

Nowhere in our constitution are the governments of municipalities or their officials either created or established as any part of our state government, but their very creation, together with all provisions for their government, are reserved to the legislative branch of the state government as erected by the constitution.

Atty-Gen. v. Connors, 27 Fla. 334.

No fact was more prominent in the history of the time during which the question of calling the convention that framed this Constitution (1885) was agitated than the inconvenience which the people of many municipalities had suffered from the restraint placed by the Constitution of 1868, of which it is a revision, upon special legislation as to cities and towns, and the action of the convention in excepting them from the requirements of the proviso discussed, was a natural response to the sentiment which had prevailed in favor of an untrammelled power of legislation as to municipalities.

State v. Dural County Comrs. 23 Fla. 492.

Whenever the legislature provided for the election of municipal officers under the authority imposed by the Constitution of 1868, such election became an election "under this Con- 23 L. R. A.

stitution," and the right to vote at such elections was by section 1 of article 14 conferred upon and guaranteed to certain persons having the qualifications therein mentioned and a reasonable opportunity for registration.

Gooding v. Brown, 22 Fla. 437.

The legislature is absolutely untrammelled by the constitution in regard to its creation, or modes of selecting or electing municipal officers; the persons who are to vote for such officers, if the legislature prescribes voting as the means of selection, are to be designated by the legislature without reference to the qualifications the constitution prescribes for voters, as to state and county officers.

State v. Burbridge, 24 Fla. 186.

The legislature may, as the law-making power, when not restrained by the constitution, provide for the exercise of the power of appointing or electing to office by either department of the government, or by any person or association of persons whom it may choose to designate for that purpose.

People v. Freeman, 80 Cal. 233; Fox v. McDonald (Ala.) 21 L. R. A. 529; State v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102.

The right of suffrage is not an absolute right. No such right exists unless specifically conferred by a constitution or a statute.

State v. Black, 16 L. R. A. 769, 54 N. J. L. 456.

Mabry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I. It is apparent from the foregoing statement that the invalidity of the municipal election held in the city of Jacksonville on the 18th day of July, 1893, is dependent upon the constitutionality of the act of the legislature under which it was held. Where usurpation of a public office, or franchise, is alleged by the state, and an information in the nature of a quo warranto is filed by the attorney-general to test the right to hold such office, or enjoy such franchise, it is only necessary ordinarily to allege, generally, that the person holding the office, or enjoying the franchise, does so without lawful authority, and in such case, as against the state, it devolves upon such person to show a complete legal right to hold the office or enjoy the privilege in question; but if the information states the facts upon which the charge of usurpation is based and the facts alleged show a clear right in the defendant, it will be held insufficient on demurrer. Enterprise v. State, 29 Fla. 128, and authorities cited. The information filed in the case now before us charges usurpation of certain municipal offices, but it is also shown that the defendants hold the offices by virtue of the election held on the 18th day of July, 1893, and their claim to the same is challenged on the ground that the legislative act under which said election was held is unconstitutional and void. No other grounds for annulling this election are alleged, and hence the constitutionality of the act is the question presented for our determination.

It is contended that the act in question, by its terms, discriminates against certain classes of persons residing in the city of Jacksonville and possessing the constitutional qualifications of electors; and that they are thereby excluded from the right to vote in the city elections, in violation of a constitutional right to do so. The 3d section of the Act under consideration reads as follows: "Those persons who at the time of the holding of any city election, are residents of the city, and who, at the time of the general state election held next preceding, were qualified electors of any of the election districts within said city, shall constitute the qualified electors of said city, authorized to vote at such city election. Each such elector shall vote only in the election district wherein he was at the time of such state election a qualified voter; provided, however, that prior to the holding of the first city election as provided herein, there shall be given to each person who was entitled to qualify himself as an elector at the last state election by registration and the payment of his poll taxes for the years 1890 and 1891, and failed to do so, an opportunity to qualify by registering and himself paying his own poll taxes for such years, more than two weeks before said first city election." Provisions are then made for the tax collector of Duval county to open his books and receive the poll taxes, and for the election commissioners, named in the Act, to arrange for the registration of those persons who were entitled to qualify themselves to vote at the last general state election by registration and the payment of their poll taxes for the years 1890 and 1891, but failed to do so. More specific reference to these provisions need not be made in this connection.

According to the plain terms of this Act, only those persons were authorized to vote in the municipal election of July 18, 1893, who were residents of the city, and who, at the time of the general state election held next preceding said municipal election, were qualified electors of some one of the election districts within the city; or who were entitled to qualify themselves as electors at said state election by registration and the payment of their poll taxes due for the years 1890 and 1891, but failed to do so. The Act fixes July 18, 1893, as the date for holding the first municipal election, and we take judicial knowledge of the fact that the general state election held next preceding this election was on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday in October, A. D. 1892. The legislature, then, by the terms of the Act in question, confined the municipal election to persons residing in the city and who possessed the constitutional qualifications of electors more than eleven months prior to the date of said city election. No provision is made whereby those who had acquired the requisite age, citizenship, and residence as prescribed for voting in the general state and county elections, since the last general state election, could vote in the municipal election. This, it is contended, independent of the provisions in reference to other matters, renders the Act void. This contention is based upon the theory that section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution of 1885 applies to municipal elections as well as to all other elections in this state, and is a limitation upon the powers of the legislature. Section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution provides that "every male person of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, that shall, at the time of registration, be a citizen of the United States, or that shall have declared his intention to become such, in conformity to the laws of the United States, and that shall have resided and had his habitation, domicile, home, and place of permanent abode in Florida for one year, and in the county for six months, shall in such county be deemed a qualified elector at all elections under this constitution." Here, it is claimed, is the fountain source of the right to exercise the elective franchise in all elections by the people, municipal as well as state and county, and that it is not within the power of the legislature to curtail or in any way abridge this right. Registration of the qualified electors may be provided for by the legislature, of course, but counsel for the state insist that registration is not one of the qualifications of an elector and that the legislature under the power to provide for registration of qualified electors must enact laws that are "reasonable, uniform, and impartial, and must be calculated to facilitate and secure, rather than subvert or impede, the exercise of the right to vote." The language quoted was employed by Chief Justice Shaw, in the noted case of Copen v. Foster, 12 Pick. 488, 28 Am. Dec. 632, in discussing the right of the legislature to regulate by registration the exercise of the elective franchise secured by constitutional provision. The authorities are uniform and abundant in support of the position that where the constitution has prescribed the qualifications of electors it is not in the power of the legislature to take from or add to such qualifications, or to injuriously, unreasonably, or unnecessarily restrain, impair, or impede the right of suffrage thus guaranteed by the constitution. And this constitutional guarantee against unreasonable and unnecessary restraint by legislative enactment extends to all elections provided for by the constitution, whether state, county, or municipal. In People v. Canaday, 78 N. C. 198, 21 Am. Rep. 465, it was decided that cities and towns, like counties and townships, were parts and parcels of the state, organized for the convenience of local self government, and that under the constitution of North Carolina the qualifications of voters in municipal elections, were the same as in state and county elections, and that it was not competent for the general assembly in any way to change the qualifications of voters as fixed by the constitution. The constitution of Massachusetts provided as to residence and citizenship that "every male citizen of twenty-one years of age and upwards, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, who shall have resided within the commonwealth one year, and within the town or district in which he may claim a right to vote six calendar months next preceding any election of governor, lieutenant-governor, senators, or representatives, and who shall have paid" certain taxes mentioned or be exempt therefrom and possessing all other required qualifications, shall have the right to vote in such elections. It was held that an act of the legislature providing that no person thereafter naturalized in any court shall be entitled to be registered as a voter within thirty days of such naturalization, was void and in conflict with the constitutional provision mentioned. By naturalization the person became a citizen and it was not competent for the legislature to add to or diminish the qualifications of a voter which had been prescribed by the constitution. Kinneen v. Wells, 144 Mass. 497, 59 Am. Rep. 105. It was decided in Ohio (Daggett v. Hudson, 43 Ohio St. 548, 54 Am. Rep. 832), that an act requiring registration in all cases as a condition to the right of suffrage, and allowing the voters only seven specified days within the year in which to register, and which contained no provision for registration after the seven days (though five days thereafter intervened before election day) and no regulation whereby those constitutionally qualified may, upon proof of qualification, and a reasonable excuse for not registering in time, be allowed to vote, and where no means were provided whereby persons necessarily absent at the time fixed for registration may have their names registered, was unreasonable and had a direct tendency to impair the right of suffrage, and as it might disfranchise a large class of persons without fault on their part, it was unconstitutional and void. The following are among many decisions sustaining the same view: State v. Corner, 22 Neb. 265; Della v. Kennedy, 49 Wis. 555, 35 Am. Rep. 786; State v. Baker, 38 Wis. 71; Rison v. Farr, 24 Ark. 161, 87 Am. Dec. 52; Monroe v. Collins, 17 Ohio St. 665; State v. Butts, 31 Kan. 537; Edmonds v. Banbury, 28 Iowa, 267, 4 Am. Rep. 177; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 758.

If section 1 of article 6 of the present Constitution, the one prescribing the qualifications of voters and declaring who shall "be deemed a qualified elector at all elections under this constitution," applies to municipal elections in this state, there cannot be a doubt as to the fate of the act of the legislature now under consideration. That it does exclude, by its terms, from voting at municipal elections in the city of Jacksonville, persons who may have the qualifications of electors for state and county elections, as prescribed by the section of the constitution referred to, is beyond question. It plainly excluded all of those residents of said city who may have acquired the qualifications of voters under the constitution for state and county elections during a period of over eleven months prior to the first city election, and for longer periods at subsequent elections as they are required to be held biennially after the election in 1893, on the fourth Tuesday in May, and occurring during years in which no general state election will be held. It is then made necessary and unavoidable that we determine whether or not section 1 of article 6 of the present Constitution has prescribed the qualifications of voters at elections in municipalities created by the legislature. This question has not been determined by any decision of this court, and no language used in prior decisions made here in reference to municipal corporations had any reference to the precise question now presented. In Atty-Gen. v. Connors, 27 Fla. 329, that part of section 15 of article 16 of the Constitution providing that "no person shall hold or perform the functions of more than one office under the government of this state at the same time," was under consideration, and it was held that a municipal government created by the legislature formed no part of the framework of the state government as constructed by the constitution. That the structure of the state government in all of its departments was provided for by the constitution, and the organization of municipal governments was expressly delegated to the legislature, but what was said in that case had no reference to the qualifications of electors authorized to vote in municipal governments to be created by the legislature.

The case of State v. Duval County Comrs., 23 Fla. 483, was a proceeding by mandamus to compel defendants to perform certain duties preparatory to holding an election in the city of Jacksonville under the provisions of acts passed by the legislature in 1887. The defenses interposed were that said acts were special and local, and no notice was given of the intention to apply for their enactment as provided in section 21 of article 3 of the Constitution; that the lieutenant-governor elected under the old Constitution of 1868 presided over the senate and signed said acts; that the title to the same was insufficient under the constitution; and that in consequence of the omission of certain provisions in sections of the original act in an amendatory act defendants were under no duty to perform them. The conclusion reached upon a consideration of the various provisions of the constitution, having any bearing on the subject, was that the proviso in section 21 of article 3 of the Constitution in reference to notice for special legislation had no application to legislation in reference to municipalities. The views expressed in the opinion on this subject are correct, but they had reference to the constitutional requirements as to notice for special legislation, and the case is not an authority on the question of prescribing the qualifications of voters at municipal elections. None of the cases in this court discussing the law bearing upon municipal governments under the present Constitution had reference to the question now presented.

Before examining the provisions of our constitution that are necessary to be considered in disposing of the question, it will be well to fix in mind the legal status of the right of suffrage as exercised under our forms of government. The right to vote is not an inherent or absolute right found among those generally reserved in bills of rights, but its possession is dependent upon constitutional or statutory grant. Subject to the limitations contained in the Federal Constitution the elective franchise is under the control of the sovereign power of the states expressed in constitutions or statutes properly enacted. Where a constitution has conferred the right and prescribed the qualifications of electors it, of course, is paramount until amended and the legislature cannot change or add to them in any way, but where the constitution does not fix the right of suffrage or prescribe the qualifications of voters it is competent for the legislature as the representative of the law-making power of the state to do so. These principles are well recognized and fully established by authority in this country. In Kinneen v. Wells, supra, it is said "the qualifications of voters are fixed by state legislation. The requisitions as to ownership of property, citizenship, sex, and residence, in connection with the right of voting, vary with the constitution or laws of the several states. However unwise, unjust, or even tyrannical its regulations may be or seem to be in this regard, the right of each state to define the qualifications of its voters is complete and perfect, except so far as it is controlled by the 15th article of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that 'the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.'" On this subject Judge Cooley says, in Constitutional Limitations, p. 752: "In another place we have said that, though the sovereignty is in the people, as a practical fact it resides in those persons who by the constitution of the state are permitted to exercise the elective franchise. The whole subject of the regulation of elections, including the prescribing of qualifications for suffrage, is left by the national constitution to the several states, except as it is provided by that instrument that the electors for representatives in congress shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature, and as the Fifteenth Amendment forbids denying to citizens the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Participation in the elective franchise is a privilege rather than a right, and it is granted or denied on grounds of general policy; the prevailing view being that it should be as general as possible consistent with the public safety." State v. Black, 54 N. J. L. 446, 16 L. R. A. 769; Huber v. Reily, 53 Pa. 112; Anderson v. Baker, 23 Md. 531.

Guided by the principles announced, we must determine whether or not our constitution has, in the section prescribing the right of suffrage at all elections under it fixed the qualifications of voters in municipal elections, or left it with the legislature. Reference to various provisions of the constitution will become necessary, and in considering them we are to be mindful of the fact that the present constitution is a revision of the former one of 1868, and not the establishment of an entirely new and independent instrument. This court has several times recognized this fact in construing clauses in the present constitution. The 11th section of the Bill of Rights in the Constitution of 1868 provided that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." This is omitted in the present instrument. The 17th section of the legislative article in the old constitution provided that "the legislature shall not pass special or local laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say, regulating the jurisdiction and duties of any class of officers, or for the punishment of crime or misdemeanors; regulating the practices of courts of justice; providing for changing venue of civil and criminal cases; granting divorces; changing the names of persons; vacating roads, town plats, streets, alleys, and public squares; summoning and impanneling grand and petit juries, and providing for their compensation; regulating county, township, and municipal business; regulating the election of county, township, and municipal officers; for the assessment and collection of taxes, for state, county, and municipal purposes; providing for opening and conducting elections for state, county, and municipal officers, and designating the places of voting; providing for the sale of real estate belonging to minors or other persons laboring under legal disabilities; regulating the fees of officers." By comparing section 20 of article 8 of the present Constitution, which corresponds with the 17th section of the legislative article in the old, it will be seen that everything relating to municipal organizations has been entirely eliminated, and no reference is there made to them except after the provisions regulating the jurisdiction and duties of any class of officers, and regulating the practice of courts of justice the words "except municipal officers," and "except municipal courts," are added. The old constitution provided that "the legislature shall establish a uniform system of county, township, and municipal government." The corresponding provision in the new is that "the legislature shall establish a uniform system of county and municipal government which shall be applicable, except in cases where local or special laws are provided by the legislature that may be inconsistent therewith." Sec. 24, art. 3. The old instrument enacted that the legislature shall provide by general law for incorporating such municipal, educational, agricultural, mechanical, mining, and other useful companies or associations as may be deemed necessary. The same provision is incorporated in the revised constitution with the word "municipal" left out. Sec. 25, art. 3. The following provision was in the former constitution, viz.: "The legislature may establish courts for municipal purposes only, in incorporated towns and cities. All laws for the organization or government of municipal courts shall be general in their provisions, and be equally applicable to the municipal courts of all incorporated towns and cities." The corresponding section in the present instrument is that "the legislature may establish in incorporated towns and cities, courts for the punishment of offenses against municipal ordinances." Sec. 84, art. 5. The changes made in the revised constitution as shown by the provisions here referred to, it may correctly be said, cannot be construed to go any farther than to release legislative regulations of municipal corporations from the limitations in the old constitution in reference to the enactment of general laws on this subject, and to authorize the legislature now to pass special laws relating to such matters when deemed necessary to do so. Conceding that such was the main purpose of the revisers in making the changes referred to, it is apparent that they eliminated by the changes mentioned all provisions in the old constitution referring to and recognizing municipal officers as a part of the machinery of government established by that instrument. The old constitution expressly referred to municipal officers as being embraced within the elective or appointive system under it. This is shown by clauses in the 17th section above quoted, such as "regulating the election of county, township, and municipal officers," providing for "opening and conducting elections for state, county, and municipal officers." The entire elimination of such clauses from the provisions referred to leaves no room for any contention so far as the provisions in lieu of them extend, that municipal elections are included in those embraced within the constitution.

The 27th section of article 4 of the old Constitution reads as follows: "The legislature shall provide for the election by the people, or appointment by the governor, of all state, county, or municipal officers not otherwise provided for by this constitution, and fix by law their duties and compensation." Provision was also made that all elections by the people shall be by ballot. The suffrage section in the old instrument, after prescribing age, citizenship, and residence at the time of offering to vote as qualifications of an elector, declared that any person mentioned possessing the qualifications prescribed "shall in such county be deemed a qualified elector at all elections under this constitution." Municipal officers, as is apparent, were recognized under the old instrument, but they were not therein designated, nor was the manner of their selection provided for. The legislature then was compelled by the terms of the constitution to resort to one of two methods in filling municipal offices. It had to be done either by election by the people or appointment by the governor, and if an election by the people was provided for, it had to be by the qualified electors as prescribed in the suffrage clause of that constitution. It was held by this court before the revision of the constitution that in the creation of municipal governments by general law of uniform operation the legislature might under the 27th section of article 4, provide for the filling of the offices either by appointment by the governor, or election by the people. Ex parte Wells, 21 Fla. 280. In revising the old constitution very little material change was made in the suffrage clause. An alteration appears in providing that the person should be twenty-one years old at the time of registration, instead of at the time of offering to vote, but the portion declaring at what elections the voter shall be deemed a qualified elector, is the same. A very material change, however, is made in the 27th section of article 4 of the old Constitution. Municipal officers are entirely eliminated, and the corresponding section in the new is that "the legislature shall provide for the election by the people or appointment by the governor of all state and county offices not otherwise provided by this constitution, and fix by law their duties and compensation." Sec. 27, art. 3. Certain state and county offices were created and designated by the constitution, but municipal offices were left to legislative control. In addition to the state and county offices designated it was within the contemplation of the framers of the constitution that other state or county offices than those designated might become necessary and have to be created, and hence provision was made that the legislature should provide for election by the people or appointment by the governor of all state and county officers not otherwise provided by the constitution. This was the completion of the method provided by the constitution for filling all state and county offices created, or that should be created under the constitution, and where the elective system for these offices applies or is made applicable, the persons possessing the qualifications under the suffrage clause in section 1 of article 6 are the electors. They are made qualified electors at all elections under this constitution. But it was certain that municipal offices were to be created by the legislature and they were not designated or otherwise provided for in the constitution, but express authority was granted to the legislature, in section 8 of article 8, to establish and abolish municipalities, to prescribe their jurisdiction and powers, and to alter or amend the same at any time. The limitation being added that "when any municipality shall be abolished, provision shall be made for the protection of its creditors." If the provision in reference to filling offices, in section 27 of article 3, had been made applicable to municipal offices, no doubt could exist about the suffrage clause in section 1 of article 6 applying to election to fill such offices, but the revisers designedly, we must conclude, released municipal elections from the operation of section 27 of article 3, and thereby qualified the application of the suffrage clause so far as municipal elections are concerned. They are not elections under the constitution, within the meaning of the suffrage section of article 6, but have been expressly exempted therefrom. Municipal offices are undoubtedly statutory offices, and in the absence of constitutional restrictions are under the control of the legislature. Under the constitution of Illinois it was made the duty of the general assembly to provide for a thorough and efficient system of free schools, where all the children of the state could receive a good common school education. The mode of organizing and administering the system was left to the general assembly without any constitutional regulations further than the mandate to provide for the system. The only school officers provided for by the constitution of that state were a county superintendent in each county, and a state superintendent of public instruction. As to the county superintendent the constitution provided that his "qualifications, powers, duties, compensation, and the time and manner of election, and term of office shall be prescribed by law." The general assembly of that state enacted that "any woman of the age of twenty-one year and upwards, belonging to either of the classes mentioned in article 7 of the Constitution of the state of Illinois, who shall have resided in this state one year, in the county ninety days, and in the election district thirty days preceding any election held for the purpose of choosing any officer of schools under the general or special school laws of this state, shall be entitled to vote at such election in the school district of which she shall at the time have been for thirty days a resident; provided, any woman so desirous of voting at any such election shall have been registered in the same manner as is provided for the registration of male voters." In People v. English, 139 Ill. 632, 15 L. R. A. 181, the question arose as to the right of women to vote for county superintendent of schools, and it was held that, as he was a constitutional officer, the qualifications of electors as prescribed by the constitution applied to all persons authorized to vote for him, and as the qualified electors under the constitution were confined to male persons possessing certain qualifications, women were not authorized to participate in such an election. In the later case of Plummer v. Post, 144 Ill. 68, 19 L. R. A. 110, it was held under the same act that women could vote for all other school officers not provided for by the constitution. The two cases are not at all in conflict, and the distinction between them is clearly pointed out. While no person was authorized to vote for the election of any officer mentioned in the constitution unless he possessed the qualifications of an elector prescribed by that instrument, yet this was not true of officers over whom the legislature had complete power and control. It was said: "It cannot be doubted that, in providing for a system of free schools, a form of organization essentially different from the present one might have been adopted. Entirely different officers might have been provided for, and provision might have been made for the designation of those officers by appointment rather than by an election. Accordingly, it is provided by section 17 of article 6 of the General School Law, that in cities having a population exceeding 100,000 the members of the school board of education shall be appointed by the mayor, by and with the advice and consent of the common council, and, unquestionably, a similar mode of appointment of school officers, other than the two above mentioned (provided for in the constitution) might have been constitutionally adopted. The general assembly having complete control of the subject, had, of course, the power to provide for the choice of these officers by popular vote, but such an election is not necessarily a proceeding identical with the elections provided for by the constitution, nor is it necessary that the qualifications of those voting for school officers should be the same as those of electors, as defined by the constitution." To the same effect is the decision in Wheeler v. Brady, 15 Kan. 26. It is said in this case: "There is no school district election or meeting provided for in the constitution, there is no provision as to how school district officers shall be elected, appointed, or chosen, and we suppose that no one will claim that they are, by the terms of the constitution, to be elected at either of the elections provided for in the constitution; hence it would seem that the legislature would have complete power over the matter; that the legislature might provide for the election or appointment of school district officers as it should choose, when it should choose, in the manner it should choose, and by whom it should choose." The cases of State v. Cones, 15 Neb. 444, and Belles v. Burr, 76 Mich. 1, were decided on the same principle. The late case of Coffin v. Thompson, 21 L. R. A. 662, does not conflict with the decisions above cited. The act of the legislature declared unconstitutional in the Coffin Case authorized women to vote at all elections for school, village, and city officers, and it was decided that it was not competent for the legislature to confer the elective franchise upon women for the purpose of voting in city elections. Such elections were embraced in the constitution of that state, and hence the qualifications of electors prescribed by the constitution for voters at all elections applied. The constitution expressly referred to city elections and provided that the officers of cities and villages shall be elected at such time and in such manner as the legislature may direct. But the distinction drawn in the cases we have cited was recognized. The opinion says: "These cases involved the validity of acts conferring upon females the right to vote for school district officers, under constitutions which, like our own, name no school district officer, do not prescribe or suggest how such officers shall be chosen, but in express terms relegate to the legislature the duty of providing for and establishing a system of primary schools." In speaking of the power of the legislature to prescribe qualifications of city officers, Judge Dixon said in State v. Von Baumbach, 12 Wis. 310: "As to all such offices and public trusts, to which the people, in the exercise of their paramount authority, have impliedly declared who shall be eligible, either by prescribing special circumstances which shall disqualify, or by reserving to themselves or to the appointing authorities a certain freedom of choice, there are very obvious reasons for holding that eligibility is in the nature of a constitutional right, and that the legislature possesses no power of exclusion not given by the constitution; but it is manifest that those reasons cannot be applied to a mere statutory office which the legislature may create and abolish at will, and concerning which the constitution contains no express provisions."

A careful examination of all the authorities at hand has not revealed any conflict as to the principles of law announced in the foregoing cases. The right of suffrage is not an inherent right, but is subject to the disposal of the sovereign power of the state. If the constitution has regulated it in any department of government, it is subject to the limitations of that instrument, but should this matter, important as it is, be entirely relegated to the legislature, or left entirely to its discretion, the only limitations placed upon legislative power are contained in the Federal Constitution. The principles of law here stated must govern us in testing the constitutionality of the act of the legislature in question, and guided by them the conclusion is inevitable. The constitution is a limitation upon the powers of the legislature, and it is incumbent on those who maintain that the legislature is forbidden to act in the matter to point out the specific provisions of the constitution containing the prohibition. If we entertain a reasonable doubt about the act being in violation of the plain spirit and provisions of the constitution, the question must be resolved in favor of the act. There are provisions in the constitution which apply to municipal corporations, but we do not think that section 1 of article 6 does. On the contrary, a careful consideration of the provisions of the constitution applicable impress us with the view that the revisers have purposely exempted municipalities from its provisions, and relegated the matter to the legislature. We are duly sensible of the gravity of this question, and have given it that consideration which its importance demands. Municipalities are auxiliaries of state governments, and the rights and interests affected by them are just as vital and dear as those involved in state and county governments, and in some particulars even more so. The justice or wisdom of constitutional or statutory regulations, however, are matters not subject to our control, but we must give effect to the law according to its meaning to be ascertained by a consideration of all of its provisions. The authorities cited by counsel on this branch of the case have been carefully read, and while they sustain fully the position that the legislature cannot make any unreasonable or unnecessary regulations tending to abridge or impair the right of suffrage secured by the constitution, they fall short of establishing the vital point in this case, that elections to fill municipal offices created by the legislature are subject to suffrage clauses in constitutions with provisions similar to our own. The decision in Gooding v. Brown, 23 Fla. 487, was made under the old constitution, and it is clear that the clause in that instrument prescribing the qualifications of voters was recognized as applying to municipal elections, as it undoubtedly did, but the limitations in the present constitution do not apply to such elections as we have pointed out. The case of People v. Canaday, supra, was well considered, and contains a lucid statement of the law, but there it was clear that the constitutional limitation as to suffrage did apply to municipal elections. The constitution of North Carolina, in broad terms, provided that every male person twenty-one years old, resident in the state twelve months, and in the county thirty days, shall be an elector. In other sections it was provided that all county and township elections shall be by the qualified voters therein, and that no county, city, town or other municipal corporation shall contract any debt unless by a vote of a majority of the qualified voters therein. There was nothing in the North Carolina constitution to negative its application to municipal elections, but its provisions showed clearly that it was intended to so apply. The same may be said of the case of Atty-Gen. v. Detroit, 58 Mich. 213, 55 Am. Rep. 875. There the clause of the constitution prescribing the qualification of voters expressly refers to elections in townships and wards, and there was no question raised as to the application of the suffrage clause to municipal elections. None of the decisions cited conflict with the construction that we are constrained to put upon the clauses of our constitution. The result is, that none of the grounds alleged in the information for annulling the act in question, based upon the exclusion of the classes of persons mentioned possessing the constitutional qualifications of voters for state and county officers since the general state election in 1892, are availing. The legislature had complete power over this matter, and in the absence of constitutional limitation it will must prevail.

II. Another alleged ground attacking the validity of the act in question, is that by its terms persons were permitted to vote in the municipal election who were qualified electors at the general state election held next prior thereto but who had afterwards lost their domicile in the state of Florida and county of Duval, and had not regained the same in time to become an elector at the time of the city election. The act confines the right to vote in municipal elections to residents of the city at the time of the city election, who were qualified electors, or entitled to become such, in any of the election districts within the city at the time of the general state election held next preceding. It is insisted that this will permits persons to vote in the city election who, though qualified electors at the last general state election, may have become disqualified to vote, since said state election, by reason of conviction for crime or other cause. It is not alleged as a matter of fact that any such disqualified persons voted at the election in July, 1893, but the law is claimed to be void because by its terms such persons are permitted to vote.

The election commissioners named in the act are required to prepare a list of the electors qualified to vote in each of the city wards at the last general state election, and this is made the list of electors at the city election, "except that the said commissioners shall add to or strike from the lists the names of such persons as may, as herein provided, appear improperly placed upon or left off said lists, or by reason of subsequent qualification entitled to be added thereto." In making the list of electors for the city election the commissioners are given access to the county registration books, tally sheets, and poll lists used at the last general state election, as well as to all other papers in the office or custody of the county supervisor of registration, and in the office of the tax collector of Duval county. The names of the persons on the list when made are required to be published, and the election commissioners from the best information obtainable are to revise the lists so as to contain all and only the names of persons who at the time of revision are residents of the city, and who were at the time of the last general state election, qualified electors of the election districts in the city, or who have since that time registered and paid their poll taxes as provided in the act. It is also provided that "if an elector be challenged he shall make oath that he is a resident of the city and entitled to vote at the election. "If his name appears upon the list of electors for the ward (and, if required, he take such oath,) he shall be permitted to vote, but no person whose name does not so appear shall be permitted to vote."

The constitution provides that no person convicted of any felony by a court of record shall be qualified to vote at any election unless restored to civil rights, and the legislature is directed to enact the necessary laws to exclude persons convicted of certain crimes from the right of suffrage. Sections 4 and 5, article 6. In obedience to this command the legislature has enacted a general law excluding persons convicted of certain crimes from the right of suffrage. Rev. Stat. § 154, div. 5. There is no purpose manifested in the act under which the election in question was held to repeal the general law in reference to excluding persons convicted of crime from voting at elections, and if the two can be construed in harmony with each other the rule is that it must be done. The act, it is true, declares those persons, residents of the city, who were qualified electors at the time of the last general state election, or entitled to become such by registration and the payment of poll taxes due for 1890 and 1891, qualified and entitled to vote in the city election, and there is in the act no express direction to the election commissioners to strike off the names of persons convicted of crimes disqualifying them to vote at any election, but the reference is to the qualified voters at the last state election, and no purpose is shown to suspend the operation of the criminal laws in reference to crimes disqualifying one to vote. The general law and the act we are construing can be construed in harmony in reference to the conviction of crimes taking away the right of suffrage, and this being the case such construction should be given to them. Those who possessed the qualifications of electors at the general state election next preceding the city election and complied with the law as to registration and the payment of poll taxes, or could have done so, were authorized to vote at the city election provided they were at that time residents thereof. Residence of a qualified voter in the city at the time of the election in connection with the qualifications mentioned at the preceding general state election conferred the right to vote at the city election without regard to changes of residence since the said state election. There is no constitutional prohibition against the power of the legislature to prescribe such qualifications.

III. It is further alleged that the act is void for the reason that by the terms thereof only those persons were allowed to vote whose names appeared on the lists after the same had been revised by the commissioners of election, without regard to registration in fact. After declaring who should constitute the qualified electors authorized to vote at the city election (being those persons residing in the city at the time of the city election, and who at the time of the general state election held next preceding, were qualified electors of any of the election districts within said city, or who were entitled to qualify themselves to vote at said state election by registering and paying their poll taxes due for the years 1890 and 1891), the act directs the commissioners of election to prepare a list of the electors qualified to vote at each of the city wards at the last general state election, and this list, it is declared, shall constitute the qualified electors to vote at the city election, subject to revision and alteration as provided in the act. In making up the list of qualified voters for the city election access was given the commissioners to the county registration books, tally sheets and poll lists used at the last general state election, and all other papers in the office or custody of the county supervisor of registration, and in the office of the tax collector of Duval county. The names of the qualified voters on the list prepared by the commissioners are required to be published, not more than two weeks before the city election, one time in a newspaper with notice of a time and place when the commissioners would meet to revise the list, the notice to be published at least two days before the meeting. At the time and place mentioned in the notice the commissioners were required to meet, and "from the best information obtainable revise said lists so as to contain all and only the names of persons at that time residents of said city, and who were, at the time of the last general state election, qualified electors of the election districts in said city, or who have since that time registered and themselves paid their own poll taxes for the years 1890 and 1891. Such lists so revised shall constitute the list of qualified voters for the several wards at said city election." It is further provided that not less than five printed copies of the lists for each ward shall be made out, on the same form as the county registration books, so as to show the number of registration certificates, age, color, etc., and each copy to be certified to be correct by the chairman of the board of election commissioners. The lists so made and certified are for the use of the inspectors and clerks appointed to hold the election, and they are required to be prepared and open to inspection at least five days before the election, and subject to correction of clerical errors by the board of election commissioners. No person whose name does not appear upon the list of electors for the wards shall be permitted to vote.

It is apparent from the provisions of the act that the commissioners were not given arbitrary power to put on the list to be prepared by them such names as they pleased, but it was made their duty to place thereon all and only the names of persons possessing the qualifications of electors prescribed by the act for voting in the municipal election. In ascertaining who were the persons authorized to vote in the city election the commissioners were under a duty to act according to law, and not arbitrarily, and their action in this respect was subject to review by a court of competent jurisdiction. Many authorities hold that where a law provides that no vote shall be received at an election unless the name of the voter is on the registration list as prepared by the registering officers, it is in violation of that portion of the constitution defining the qualifications of electors. Dells v. Kennedy, State v. Corner, Doggett v. Hudson, and People v. Canaday, supra, belong to this class of decisions. They are based upon the theory that the constitutional qualifications of electors apply, and that the legislature cannot by any regulations deprive the voter of a right given him by the constitution without fault on his part. But as we have already seen, the qualifications of electors prescribed by our constitution at all elections under it do not apply to municipal elections, hence there is no inhibition in this clause against the authority of the legislature to make the ascertainment of the elector's right to vote in the city election by the election commissioners conclusive. It may be contended, however, that after prescribing the qualifications of those who were entitled to vote in the municipal election, the legislature could not confer upon the commissioners the power to conclusively determine who were possessed of the qualifications thus prescribed, on the ground that it was granting to a mere ministerial board judicial powers with which it could not be invested. If it be conceded that the legislature could not make the ministerial ascertainment by the board of election commissioners conclusive of the voter's right under the statute, this will not authorize the vacation of the election held in July last on the showing before us. It is not alleged or claimed that any voter was denied his right to vote at said election by reason of the failure of the commissioners to perform their duty under the statute, and for aught we know every person in the city authorized to vote cast his ballot. The legislature had the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters at such an election, and it was competent for it to provide the means of ascertaining who were the persons authorized to vote. Although the action of a ministerial board in performing the duty of ascertaining the qualified electors under a statute may not be given a conclusive effect as to the voter's rights, and to the extent that the statute before us undertakes to make such action conclusive, it may be inoperative, yet this alone should not invalidate an election in the absence of any showing that voters were deprived of any rights under the statute.

IV. It is also alleged that by the terms of the act in question the qualified electors of the city of Jacksonville were not permitted to vote for whom they pleased, but were restricted in the right of suffrage to vote for persons whose names were placed upon an official ballot by the election commissioners. It has been held by this court that the last clause of section 6 of article 6 of the Constitution, which is, that "in all elections by the people the vote shall (be) by ballot," applies to municipal elections. State v. Anderson, 26 Fla. 240. We still adhere to this decision. It was here said that "the material guarantee of this constitutional mandate of vote by ballot is inviolable secrecy as to the person for whom an elector shall vote. The distinguishing theory of the ballot system is that every voter shall be permitted to vote for whom he pleases, and that no one else shall be in a position to know for whom he has voted, or shall know unless the voter shall of his own free will inform him." There is no doubt in our minds about the right of the legislature to prescribe an official ballot and to prohibit the use of any other, and the provisions of the act in reference to printing the names of candidates regularly nominated by a convention, mass-meeting, or primary election, or who run as independents, are valid. But the legislature cannot, in our judgment, restrict an elector to voting for some one of the candidates whose names have been printed upon the official ballot. He must be left free to vote for whom he pleases, and the constitution has guaranteed to him this right. If the legislature can restrict the voter to some candidate whose name is printed on the official ballot, then it may prescribe such regulations for getting the names of candidates on the ballot as will completely destroy the liberty of choice.

Counsel for defendants contend that while the act prescribes an official ballot, and prohibits the use of any other, and also provides for the printing upon the official ballot to be used, the names of all candidates who have been certified to the election commissioners as put in nomination by any convention, mass meeting, or primary election, as well as independent candidates who have the indorsement for that purpose, of ten per cent, and not less than twenty-five, of the electors qualified to vote for such office, yet it does not prohibit the voter from putting another name by "paster" over the name of any candidate on the ballot, or from erasing the name of any candidate and writing in lieu thereof another of the voter's choice. We have considered the cases cited on this point, State v. Black, 54 N. J. L. 446, 16 L. R. A. 769; Detroit v. Rush, 82 Mich. 532, 10 L. R. A. 171, and De Walt v. Bartley, 146 Pa. 520, 15 L. R. A. 771,—and recognize fully the rule that every presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of the law, and that it will require a very clear case to justify a court in striking it down on the ground of unconstitutionality. It is also true that where an act is fairly susceptible of two constructions, one of which conflicts while the other is in harmony with the constitution, that construction which supports will be preferred to that which destroys the law. Emporia v. Norton, 13 Kan. 569. The act before us prescribes an official ballot and prohibits the use of any other. Upon each ballot shall be printed in uniform plain type in a single column the names of all the candidates certified to the election commissioners in the manner provided in the act, and the names of all candidates for the same office shall be printed together, and arranged alphabetically according to the initials of their surnames, irrespective of party. Immediately to the left of each name, in a line with the middle of the letters of the name, a dash or short line not less than one quarter of an inch in length is required to be printed. Specific directions are then given for arranging on the ballot the names of the various officers to be voted for as follows, viz.: "On said ballots shall be printed, first, under the head of 'Mayor,' the words 'vote for one,' followed by the names of all the candidates for that office; next under the head 'Councilmen at Large,' the words 'vote for seven,' followed by the names of all the candidates for that office," and so on for all the officers to be elected. On the ballots for councilmen at large on the line with the name, the number of the ward in which the candidate resides is printed, and each ballot is to have attached to it a stub so attached that when the ballot is folded the stub can be detached without injury to the ballot or exposing its contents, upon which stub the number of the ballot for that ward must be printed. Provision is also made for attaching together in blocks the ballots for use at the wards, the number of the ballots to be used, and for furnishing the inspectors of election with the ballots for use on the day of election. It was entirely competent for the legislature to prescribe the regulations here referred to, and if there were no others on the subject of casting the ballot, we think the voter, although confined to the use of the official ballot, could put upon it the name of any person in lieu of the name of the candidate printed thereon, and such a ballot would be legal. There is in the provisions here referred to no denial, express or implied, of his right to do so, and under the decisions cited we think he would have such right. But in another portion of the same section of the act, in providing for the entrance of the voter into the polling place and the receipt by him of an official ballot, it is enacted that "he shall go to one of the voting shelves, tables, or compartments, and there privately cross or check-mark across the dash, or short line in front of the name of the candidate of his choice for each office to be filled, which cross or check shall constitute his vote." The requirement is that he shall check the name of the candidate of his choice. The candidate here referred to cannot fairly or naturally mean any other than some candidate whose name had gotten on the ballot in the manner provided in the act. This is the only fair and reasonable construction to be put upon the clauses mentioned, and its effect is to restrict the voter to a choice of candidates printed on the ballot which we have said cannot be done. That phase of the act, then, which restricts the voter to checking the name of some candidate on the official ballot is in conflict with the constitutional provision in reference to voting by ballot.

The result just stated gives rise to the question whether the valid parts of the act can remain operative, notwithstanding the unconstitutional feature, and whether they are so essentially and inseparably connected in substance that the legislature would not have enacted the one without the other. If the two can be separated and the legislative purpose expressed in the valid portion can be accomplished independently of the void part, and considering the entire act it cannot be said that the legislature would not have passed the valid part had it been known that the invalid portion must fail; it is our duty to sustain so much as is good. In English v. State, 81 Fla. 840, and Donald v. State, Id. 255, the constitutionality of the Act of 1891, reducing a grand jury to twelve persons, and giving eight of the number the right to find a bill, was before us. It was held that the legislature could not authorize less than twelve grand jurors to find an indictment, but upon consideration of the entire act in which the provision reducing the number to twelve was found, it could not be said that the legislature would not have passed the provision making the jury consist of twelve persons had it been known that the other clause authorizing eight to concur in finding indictments could not be carried out. In the Donald Case it was said that "the distribution of statutes into sections is, however, purely artificial, and in determining whether the valid parts can remain operative notwithstanding the unconstitutional parts, the point is not whether they are contained in the same section, but whether they are essentially and inseparably connected in substance, or are so interdependent that the legislature would not have enacted one without the other." The unconstitutional feature of the statute now before us is in requiring the voter to check a candidate printed on the official ballot. If this feature be eliminated the remaining portions of the act are sufficient to authorize an election and permit the electors to vote for whom they please. The leading and controlling purpose of the act was to permit the electors named in it to vote for municipal officers in the city of Jacksonville, and we cannot say that the legislature would not have passed the valid portions of the act if the void feature had been called to its attention. The greatest difficulty we have had on this branch of the case is in determining the effect of the void portion of the act on the election already held. In the case of State v. Constantino, 42 Ohio St. 437, 51 Am. Rep. 883, it was decided on quo warranto proceedings that a statute authorizing an election of four members of the police board at the same election, but denying an elector the right to vote for more than two members, and directed the rejection of any ballot with more than two names on it, was in conflict with the constitution regulating the right to vote by ballot, and that the members elected at such an election were not duly elected, and should be ousted from their offices. In People v. Kenney, 96 N. Y. 294, it was held that where part of a statute was unconstitutional, this did not affect the validity of the remainder, unless the provisions are so interdependent that one cannot operate without the other, or are so related, in substance and object, that it is impossible to suppose that the legislature would have passed the one without the other. After striking out the invalid part, if that which remains is complete in itself and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, it must be retained, and this is so although the condemned portion is found in the same section with the part retained. In this case it was further held, in construing an act providing for the election of aldermen at large of the city of New York, and prohibiting the electors from voting for more than two thirds of the whole number to be elected, that conceding such a provision, as to voting for two thirds only, to be in conflict with the constitution, this did not affect the validity of the residue of the section, or prevent the election of aldermen in the manner specified. It is said: "So far as the case discloses, every voter in the city voted for as many candidates for aldermen at large as he wished to. It does not appear that any voter claimed the right to vote for all the six aldermen, and was denied that right. If he chose voluntarily to waive his constitutional right to vote for six, and to vote for but four, that he could do and his ballot would be a valid ballot." People v. Perley, 80 N. Y. 624, holds that where a statute prohibits those voting at an election from voting for more than two of three officers to be elected, ballots cast in pursuance of the act are not invalidated by its unconstitutionality in part; the fact that the electors exercised in part only their privilege or duty of voting, does not affect the votes actually given. The decision in Andrews v. Saucier, 13 La. Ann. 301, was that the principal object of an election is the casting of votes, and the unconstitutionality of police provisions of an election law cannot render votes cast illegal, and thus disfranchise those who vote; the citizens have the prerogative of voting, and the legislature cannot, by encompassing with unconstitutional provisions an election law, make the votes of electors null and void. The public good demands that the will of the people as determined at the ballot box should not lightly be disturbed.

In considering objections to an election on the ground that the registration law made no provision for the registration of those who might become qualified to vote after the registration is closed, and before the day of election, Judge M'Kay said, in Weil v. Calhoun, 25 Fed. Rep. 865: "It seems to me that such objections to the registration ought, for reasons of public policy, to conform to the rules applicable to objections to elections not held in strict conformity to law, to wit: it should be made affirmatively to appear that the result would have been different had the illegality not existed. Perhaps the voter might have private redress for the wrong done him in refusing his vote, but that is a very different thing from making an election void on a mere abstraction not affecting the result." In the Ohio case cited, the void portion of the act was regarded as destructive of the whole, but the other cases mentioned are opposed to this view.

As has already been stated, if we reject the void portion of the act before us, which must be done, what remains is sufficient to authorize an election, and there is no allegation that any voter, at the election in question, desired to vote for any other person than some candidate on the official ballot, and was as a matter of fact denied the right to do so. The state is standing entirely upon the unconstitutionality of the entire act, and the rights of all the voters at the election are involved. The better rule is, it seems to us, that where an election authorized to be held is attacked solely on the ground of the illegality of some of the provisions of the law under which it is held, but not affecting it as an entirety, it should be made affirmatively to appear that the result would have been different had the illegality not existed.

V. What has been said disposes of all the objections alleged in the information to the validity of the act in question, but others were urged in argument here and insisted on in the briefs filed, and we should notice them. Several objections are made to the provisions of the act requiring the payment of poll taxes by those who were entitled to qualify themselves to vote at the last general state election by registration and the payment of their poll taxes for the years 1890 and 1891, but failed to do so. The first objection under this head is, that the act is void because it requires the voter to pay in person the poll taxes mentioned, and denies him the right to do so by an agent. The language of the act on this subject is: "Provided, however, that prior to the holding of the first city election as provided herein, there shall be given to each person who was entitled to qualify himself as an elector at the last state election by registration and the payment of his poll taxes for the years 1890 and 1891, and failed to do so, an opportunity to qualify by registering and himself paying his own poll taxes for such years, more than two weeks before said first city election." The list of persons authorized to vote at the city election prepared by the commissioners of election is required to be revised so as to contain "all and only the names of persons at that time residents of said city and who were, at the time of the last general state election, qualified electors of the election districts in said city, or who have since that time registered and themselves paid their own poll taxes due for the years 1890 and 1891." Our construction of the provisions mentioned is, that they do not deprive the voter of his right to pay his poll taxes through an authorized agent, and that a payment made by such agent would be a valid payment under the terms of the act. A liberal construction should obtain in favor of the voter's right to make the payment through another, and the act does not in terms deny such right. It is true it says "himself paying his own poll taxes" for the years mentioned, but the general principle, qui facit per alium facit per se, should apply, and the payment through an authorized agent would be the payment by the voter himself. In the case of State v. Johnson, 30 Fla. 499, we held that under the statutes regulating the payment of poll taxes since June 12, 1892, a tax collector had no right to refuse to receive such taxes when tendered by a party on behalf of others from whom they are due, although the person making the tender was not authorized by the other persons to pay the same. This was the construction put upon the statutes in force since the adoption of the Revised Statutes in reference to paying poll taxes, and no question as to the power of the legislature to restrict the voter to the payment of such taxes in person arose or was decided in the case. In the present case we hold that the legislature has not denied the voter the right to pay his poll taxes through another authorized to do so, and that payments made by such agent must be considered payments made by the voter himself. This being the proper construction to be placed upon the act, it is unnecessary to say anything in reference to the power of the legislature to require payments in person by the voter.

VI. It is further objected that the act under consideration requires the payment of two poll taxes, that is, poll taxes for both of the years 1890 and 1891, as a prerequisite to the right to vote in the municipal election held in July, 1893. The meaning of the act, and hence the proper construction to be put upon it, is that the class of persons mentioned as being entitled to qualify themselves to vote at the last general state election, by registration and the payment of their poll taxes for the years 1890 and 1891, and failed to do so, shall be permitted to do so by registering before the election commissioners and paying, within the time specified, such poll taxes as they were due for the years 1890 and 1891. The act does not impose upon the class of persons mentioned any poll taxes that were not due for the years 1890 and 1891, but does require the voter to pay within the time mentioned in the act such poll taxes as he would have had to pay in order to vote at the state election in 1892. This is apparent from the language of the act, that they shall "pay their own poll taxes due for the years 1890 and 1891." Under the state registration law the supervisor of registration was directed to note on the books to be furnished the inspectors of the different election districts the names of all persons registered therein who shall have paid, at least thirty days before the day of election, their poll taxes for two years next preceding such election as shown by the lists furnished to the supervisor by the tax collector, and only such persons shall be deemed qualified voters or authorized to vote at any general, special or municipal election; "provided, that no person shall be prevented from voting on account of not having so paid a poll tax, for any year which shall not have been lawfully assessable against him by reason of his not having been a resident of the state, or not having been of age, and who shall have obtained from such supervisor a certificate to that effect, and shall at the time of offering to vote exhibit such certificate to the inspector of elections." Rev. Stat. § 173. The act under consideration has reference to the poll taxes due under the General Revenue Law for the years 1890 and 1891, and if no poll taxes were due under the requirements of that law, then none could be insisted on under the municipal act as a prerequisite to the right to vote in the city election. If, however, a poll tax was due for either of the years mentioned, it was required to be paid.

This is the proper construction to be placed upon the act, we think, and if it is competent for the legislature to make the payment of the one dollar capitation tax for more than one year in arrear a prerequisite to the right to vote in municipal elections, all objections, as to the right to demand payment of poll taxes from the municipal voters, must fall. The constitutional provisions on this subject are: "The legislature may also provide for levying a special capitation tax, and a tax on licenses. But the capitation tax shall not exceed one dollar a year, and shall be applied exclusively to common school purposes." Art. 9, § 5. "The legislature shall have power to make the payment of the capitation tax a prerequisite for voting, and all such taxes received shall go into the school fund." Art. 6, § 8. One dollar a year is the limit authorized to be imposed for a capitation tax, and this tax can be made a prerequisite to the right to vote. There is in the provisions of the constitution referred to no limitation against the right to require delinquent capitation taxes to be paid as a prerequisite to voting; provided such taxes do not amount to more than one dollar each year. Neither the state law, nor the act under consideration, requires the payment of more than one dollar a year for the years 1890 and 1891. It is competent for the legislature to require the payment of the capitation tax, as a prerequisite to voting, and this includes all the annual capitation taxes remaining unpaid, not exceeding of course one dollar for each year.

Under this head it is further insisted that the requirement as to the payment of poll taxes more than two weeks before the election is void. This objection may be considered in connection with the one against the regulations prescribed as to registration before the commissioners of those persons who were entitled to qualify themselves to vote at the last general election and failed. The provisions, both as to the time of payment of the poll taxes and the registration of the persons designated, it is insisted are unreasonable, unnecessary and tend to impair and subvert the right to vote. Those persons residing in the city at the time of the city election, and who at the time of the general state election held next preceding, were qualified electors, were declared by the act to be the qualified electors in the city election, with a further provision that those who were entitled to qualify themselves to vote at said state election by registering and paying their poll taxes due for the years 1890 and 1891, and failed to do so, should have an opportunity to register and pay said taxes two weeks before the city election. The tax collector's books were required to be kept open from the first of June, 1893, until the time for paying poll taxes for the purposes of the election expired. The registration contemplated was to be had under the supervision of the election commissioners. They were directed to meet on or before the 3d day of July, 1893, and provide for the registration of those to whom the opportunity for registering had been given. We again observe that it is not a constitutional right here regulated, but the conferring of a right by the legislature not guaranteed by the constitution. Neither is it alleged or claimed that the election commissioners did not in fact make ample provision for registering all those who were entitled to register, or that any person so entitled did not register and vote. The election is claimed to be void because the regulations as to paying poll taxes and registering are unreasonable and impair the voter's constitutional rights as an elector.

It is not necessary to say what would be our conclusion if we were dealing with regulations of the right of suffrage secured by the constitution, as the voter at municipal elections under our constitution has no such right. The legislature under our system has control of this matter. In the case here the legislature provided that certain persons should have the right to vote at a municipal election by paying poll taxes in arrear and registering two weeks before the election. The registration contemplated was to be under the control and supervision of the election commissioners, and they were required to meet on or before the 8d day of July and provide for the registration of those who were given an opportunity to do so. In passing upon the validity of this act we are to be guided by the rule that a deliberate act of the legislature must be upheld if it can be done without doing violence to the fundamental law. Its reasonableness or justice, so long as it does not contravene some portion of the organic law, is a matter for legislative consideration, and not subject to our control. Should we entertain the view that the time given in the act for registration was unreasonable, the legislative view is different, and as there is no constitutional limitation upon its action in this respect, its will must stand as the law. The attack upon the election held thereunder is based solely upon the sufficiency of the law authorizing it, and such election cannot be set aside, especially where there is no showing that any voters were deprived of any rights given by the statute by reason of the failure on the part of the election commissioners to perform the duties imposed upon them.

VII. A further objection is made that it was not competent for the legislature to appoint or designate the three election commissioners named in the act, for the reason that this was not a legislative function, but executive in its nature, and thence forbidden to be exercised by the legislative department. The act declares that three persons named shall constitute "a board of election commissioners to make all the necessary preparations for and hold and declare the result of the election to be held July 18, 1898; and thereafter the board of police commissioners shall perform those duties." The objection here made is not that the legislature cannot provide for a board of election commissioners to make the necessary preparations for and to hold and declare the result of the election, but that the designation of the members of the board is an executive function, and does not belong to the legislature. It is entirely clear that the three election commissioners provided for in the act are not officers within the meaning of section 27 of article 8 of the Constitution, nor are they officers in any sense, but constitute a temporary board for the performance of certain specified duties in connection with holding an election authorized by the legislature. If the appointment of such a board is inherently and essentially executive in its nature, the distribution of powers of government under the second article of the Constitution will take it out of the powers of the legislature. But our conclusion is that the designation of persons to perform the functions conferred upon the commissioners of election in the act before us is not necessarily or essentially executive, and that the legislature can exercise such a power. For a discussion of the law bearing on this subject we refer to the cases of Roanoke v. State, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93; State v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65; Hovey v. State, 119 Ind. 387; Fox v. McDonald (Ala.) 21 L. R. A. 529; Barnes v. Pike County Suprs. 51 Miss. 305; note to People v. Freeman, 18 Am. St. Rep. 122, 80 Cal. 233, and authorities cited.

We have maturely considered all the objections presented as to the constitutionality of the act in question, and the validity of the municipal election held under it in July last, and the foregoing pages contain a reference to and discussion of all the material points in the case.

Our conclusion is, that the demurrer to the information should be sustained, and it is so ordered.

N. P. WHEELER and L. R. Freeman et al., Appts.

Allowing gas to escape into the open air and go to waste, because it is not profitable to utilize it, from a well which has been lawfully drilled, without malice or negligence, in one's own premises, gives no legal ground of complaint to a neighboring owner on the ground that gas is thereby drained from the adjoining lands to the detriment of his wells, and

NOTE.—The novelty of the above case and the able discussion both in opinions and briefs of the questions involved make the case one of unusual interest. The question of motive in the use of one's own property is so far reaching and so imperfectly settled by authorities that every case which adds anything to that subject is of great importance.

On the question of malice in the use of one's own property, which is suggested but not decided in the above case, see the cases of Flaherty v. Moran (Mich.) 8 L. R. A. 183, and Rideout v. Knox (Mass.) 2 L. R. A. 51, as to malice in erecting fences.

the latter has no right to plug the well and prevent the waste of the gas, even at his own expense.

(October 2, 1892.)

APPEAL by defendants Freeman et al. from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Warren County granting a preliminary injunction to restrain defendants from permitting the gas from a well which they had put down to go to waste, and from removing from the well a plug or cap which had been placed there by complainants. Reversed.

The opinion delivered by the court below was as follows:

"A preliminary injunction was granted ex parte at chambers October 26. October 29 a hearing was had upon notice to the defendants, and I am now to determine the right of the plaintiffs to a continuance of the injunction until further order. The material facts, as disclosed by the bill and affidavits, are as follows: The plaintiffs, W. W. Hague and the Citizens' Gas Company, are lessees for oil and gas purposes of certain lands lying in this and the adjoining county of Forest. The defendants Watson, Freeman, and Syms are lessees or owners of the oil and gas in certain other lands lying near those in which the plaintiffs are interested. Since 1887 and 1888, respectively, the plaintiffs have been producing and marketing natural gas upon their respective premises in paying quantities. In 1890 the defendants caused a well to be drilled upon their premises, which produced gas in large quantity, but they never have used or marketed the same. In 1891 the derrick at this well was destroyed by fire, and the gas escaped into the air. The defendants refusing or neglecting to shut it in, the plaintiffs did so at their own expense, and the well remained in this condition until shortly before the present application. The allegations of the bill that the defendants agreed to shut in the well and put it under the control of the plaintiffs in consideration of $1,650 per annum, and that they threatened to keep the well open unless paid an exorbitant price, are expressly denied in the affidavit of Mr. Freeman, and we lay them out of view. At the time the bill was drawn the defendants had given directions to have the well opened, and at the time of the hearing it was conceded that it was, in fact, open, and on fire, the gas thereby going to waste. The only answer to the plaintiffs' allegations thus far made is the affidavit of Mr. Freeman, before referred to. It denies that the injury to the plaintiffs will be serious or irreparable, but gives no facts bearing upon the matter, and states the affiant's belief that the plaintiff Hague has no interest in the leases set out in the bill. These averments are too indefinite to defeat the right of the plaintiffs to an injunction, especially in view of the conceded fact that the granting of such an order will work no pecuniary loss to the defendants, while its refusal will inflict great loss upon the plaintiffs, if in fact they are entitled to such relief. The positive statement in the affidavit that the acts of the defendants now complained of had been invited by the Citizens' 22 L. R. A.

Gas Company through its president might defeat this application so far as that company is concerned, but as it cannot affect the plaintiff Hague it is not necessary to consider it at this time. I am obliged, therefore, to consider this application upon the merits of the case, leaving out of view any contractual relations between the parties and regarding only their respective rights and duties as adjacent owners of oil and gas. For the purposes of this case they may be treated as owners of the land itself.

"The mere fact that the defendants, by operations upon their land, are taking gas from the earth, and thereby diminishing the quantity of gas which would otherwise come to the plaintiffs' wells, furnishes no ground for complaint or equitable interference, and this is freely conceded. If the plaintiffs have any right it rests upon the fact that the defendants are not taking gas in the ordinary course of mining, or for purposes beneficial to themselves or others, but are permitting it to go to waste. Malice is not expressly alleged in the bill, but the facts disclose no possible motive for so doing except a purpose of diminishing the amount which the plaintiffs will get through their wells, though the natural inference would be that the defendants are not actuated by feelings of malevolence towards the plaintiffs, but are seeking, through their power to injure, to secure a better bargain. The questions thus presented for my determination on this preliminary application are of great importance and delicacy, and, so far as I am advised, have never been determined in any court. I regret that I am obliged to decide without the aid of adequate and thorough argument, such as the able counsel representing the respective parties could have made had they not been prevented by the emergency of their case. I have, however, examined every authority bearing upon the case which I have been able to find, and will state the conclusions to which they lead my mind. If the defendants have a right to take gas from their well in unlimited quantities for their own profit, how far is their right affected by the fact, if it be a fact, that their motive in taking it is not profit, but injury to another, —malice in the legal sense? There are many dicta and some authorities which seem to declare that an act done in the exercise of a lawful right, and without negligence, may be unlawful if done with express malice. Prominent among these is the carefully considered case of Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 532, 64 Am. Dec. 721, in which the rule of the civil law is cited with approval by Chief Justice Lewis to the following effect: 'He who, in making a new work upon his own estate, uses his right without trespassing either against any law, custom, title, or possession which may subject him to any service towards his neighbors, is not answerable for the damages which they may chance to sustain thereby, unless it be that he made that change with a view to hurt others without any advantage to himself.' The same doctrine is approved in Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 514, 84 Am. Dec. 511, and Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 113

Pa. 148, 57 Am. Rep. 445, and other cases.

"The suggestion that one may not do maliciously what he might lawfully do if his motives were good is found in many English cases, among which are Acton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 338, and Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. L. Cas. 387. It has been more or less clearly made in the following, among other cases, in other states of this Union: Greenleaf v. Francis, 18 Pick. 117; Roath v. Driecoll, 20 Conn. 538, 52 Am. Dec. 352; Carson v. Western R. Co. 8 Gray, 423; Howland v. Vincent, 10 Met. 371, 43 Am. Dec. 442; Brown v. Illius, 25 Conn. 588, 71 Am. Dec. 49; Gallagher v. Dodge, 48 Conn. 389, 40 Am. Rep. 182. I have not been able to find any case, however, in which a party has been actually held to liability on this ground alone. On the other hand, there are many cases in which malice, as a criterion of liability for civil damages, is distinctly repudiated, and among these our own cases of Cavanhoran v. Hart, 21 Pa. 495, 60 Am. Dec. 57; Jenkins v. Fowler, 24 Pa. 308; Fowler v. Jenkins, 28 Pa. 176; and Glendon Iron Co. v. Uhler, 75 Pa. 467, 15 Am. Rep. 599. 'Malicious motives,' says Black, J., in Jenkins v. Fowler, 'make a bad act worse; but they cannot make that wrong which in its own essence is lawful. . . . As long as a man keeps himself within the law by doing no act which violates it, we must leave his motives to Him who searches the heart.' To the same effect are Mahan v. Brown, 13 Wend. 261, 28 Am. Dec. 461; Clinton v. Myers, 46 N. Y. 511, 7 Am. Rep. 373; Phelps v. Nowlen, 72 N. Y. 39, 28 Am. Rep. 93; South Royalton Bank v. Suffolk Bank, 27 Vt. 505; Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49.

"Without lengthening out this opinion by pointing out the distinctions between these cases, it is enough to say that my mind inclines strongly to the conclusion that the presence or absence of malice cannot of itself determine the liability of an owner of land for an act done upon it. If the act is lawful when done with innocent intentions, it is no less so because the motives were bad. If these defendants might lawfully drill a hole into the gas-bearing rock, and suffer the valuable gas to escape, because they foolishly but honestly believed that the use of natural gas is an injury to mankind, they may do so for the purpose of keeping their neighbor from getting it, even if the motive is purely malevolent. Such, in my opinion, is the weight of the authorities, as well as the reason of the case. But this assumes that the act done with malicious intent invades no legal right of another. The cases are all of this character, or were so regarded by the courts deciding them. On the other hand, the cases which seem to announce a different doctrine deal with rights which are not absolute and exclusive, but qualified and correlative. An example of the former is Fowler v. Jenkins, supra, in which the action was brought for maliciously tearing down a fence which neither the plaintiff nor the defendant had a right to maintain. Of the latter is Greenleaf v. Francis, in which the action was brought for digging a well so near the plaintiff's well as to divert the water. The instructions of the trial court to the jury, which were indorsed by the appellate court, were: 'That if the defendant had a legal right to dig a well upon any part of his own land for the purpose of obtaining water for his own use; that if he dug his own well where he did for that purpose, he was justified in so doing, although the effect might be to diminish the water in the plaintiff's well; that if he dug where he did for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff, and not for the purpose of obtaining water for his own use, he was liable in this action; but if he thus dug his well for the purpose of accommodating himself with water he was not liable for so doing, even if he at the same time entertained feelings of hostility towards the plaintiff, and a desire to injure her, and these feelings were thereby gratified.' Malice implies knowledge. If the defendant in the case above cited dug his well maliciously, he knew beforehand where to dig to tap the same subterranean stream from which the plaintiff's well was supplied. His right in such water was qualified by the right of the plaintiff in the same flow of water. He could use it without stint, even if it exhausted the plaintiff's well, but he could not wantonly destroy it, nor take it not for use, but merely to injure his neighbor. Malice in such a case is not the criterion of liability, but is an index which clearly shows an overstepping of the line, otherwise difficult to trace, between the respective rights of the parties. The true place of malice in such inquiries is clearly defined by the court in Chatfield v. Wilson, above cited, in the following paragraph from the opinion of the court: 'There are many cases in the books relating to the relative use of surface streams, where the case has turned upon the question whether the use was reasonable, and for the party's own convenience or benefit, or wanton and malicious, and done to prejudice the rights of another. In such cases there are correlative rights to the use of the water, and the boundary of the right is a reasonable use of it.' Respecting rights in water I find the following from the pen of Judge Cooley in the Southern Law Review (reprinted 14 Alb. L. J. 63), which, though not delivered ex cathedra, is none the less dispassionate and sensible: 'There seems to be some difficulty in laying down a rule for these cases that will be quite satisfactory in principle and in its workings. That a man may lawfully make an excavation on his premises for the sole purpose of drawing away the water from his neighbor's well and rendering it useless, seems to be, and is in fact, a monstrous doctrine. On the other hand, it cannot be said, consistent with the authorities, or perhaps with reason, that adjoining proprietors have rights in the water percolating the soil corresponding to those they may have in a running stream which crosses their several estates. Such a rule would raise questions of reasonable use, and create difficulties both of evidence and of application that would make the right to such waters more troublesome than valuable. The courts have doubtless been right in declaring that one proprietor cannot insist on another keeping his estate as a filter for the use of the former, nor be heard to complain if the use by his neighbor of his own estate draws off the secret particles of water which otherwise he might have gathered. These waters belong to no one until they are collected, and they may be appropriated by the one who collects and puts them to use. But though neither proprietor has such a right in or control over the water as will enable him to complain of his neighbor's appropriation, does not each owe to the other certain duties of good neighborhood, among which is the duty to abstain from purposely withdrawing the water that may be useful to both, when a use of it is not intended? Conceding that he may collect it for use, does this entitle him to do so not for use, but of malice? If he sinks a well to supply his house, or water his stock, it must be admitted that no question can be raised whether this is or is not a reasonable appropriation of the water; but if he digs a hole to injure his neighbor, it is not perceived that the two cases are necessarily to be governed by the same rule. What is a man's right to water percolating through the soil? The just answer seems to be this: It is a right to gather and appropriate it to his lawful uses. When he does this he is exercising his right, and his motive is not open to inquiry. But when he collects it, not for use, but to injure his neighbor, he exceeds his right, and there is that conjunction of wrong and injury which constitutes a tort and will support an action. In most of the cases malice and negligence are coupled together, and in respect to the rights of the party injured it would seem that liability would result from one in any case where it would from the other. No matter how negligently an act may be done, it creates no liability unless some legal right of another is injuriously affected. The same is true of an act done maliciously, and the converse holds in both cases. And where the right of one to do an act is limited by any qualification, it must be held to stop short of a right to do it from pure malice.

"What, then, are the rights of adjoining owners of oil and gas? Are they absolute and independent, or qualified and correlative? These valuable products are obtainable only in connection with the ownership of land, and for many purposes are to be regarded as minerals, and as constituting an integral portion of the land itself. Punk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 229; Stoughton's App. 88 Pa. 198. But they are not, like coal and iron ore, fixed in their place in the rocks, so that the owner may know his own, protract his lines downwards to mark his boundaries, and take them when he pleases. As water percolates by untraceable rills through the gravel, so these 'minerals feræ naturæ,' as they have been aptly called in a recent case, permeate the porous rocks deep in the bowels of the earth, and rush to the surface through any opening made through the impervious cap by which the basin which contains them is sealed. No landowner gets through his wells oil or gas exclusively from his own land. That which saturates his rocks may be lawfully taken by his neighbor through wells on his land, tapping the common reservoir. From the very nature of the case, the right of each owner is qualified. It is common to all whose land overlies the basin, and each must of necessity exercise his right with some regard to the rights of the others. Notwithstanding the fugitive nature of oil and gas, I think it will not be doubted that if a party by negligent operations upon adjacent land injures the flow of oil wells, as, for example, by neglecting to case off the fresh water, he would be liable in damages to the well owners so injured. Such a liability as to wells of water was established in Collins v. Chartiers Valley Gas Co., 131 Pa. 143, 6 L. R. A. 280, and the right to gas or oil would seem to be of as high a character as the right to water. If the owner of gas wells or land has such an interest in the gas that he can recover for an injury done by negligence, he surely may when it is done of deliberate purpose. The same considerations of natural justice which limit the ownership of running water to the usufruct, and of percolating waters to their use in a broader sense, must of necessity impose qualifications upon the enjoyment of all right of property which, from the nature of the things possessed, man must enjoy together. The owners cannot be permitted to carry on their operations in lawless irresponsibility, but must submit to such limitations as are inevitable to enable each to get his own. The fact that these limitations are not found clearly defined in the books is no proof that they do not exist. The common law is a growing tree; its principles must be continually adapted to new facts, and the changing conditions of modern life. Only the legislature can grub it up, but the courts are charged with the duty of pruning its branches, and sometimes grafting a new scion on the old stock. I concede that the defendants may lawfully take as much gas as they can get by wells drilled upon their land, and apply it to any useful purpose, though with an avowed intention of destroying the plaintiffs' wells by so doing, and a malicious pleasure in the act. But their well in its present condition is not a means of obtaining gas for any purpose. It is a mere conduit, by which the gas imprisoned in the rocks is enabled to escape into the atmosphere. All who have proved their ability to obtain gas from that reservoir are interested in common in its preservation, and the reckless waste of it is an injury to all. Whatever other qualifications may attach to the landowner's right, it seems to me clear that it must of necessity be limited to legitimate operations for profit,—not malice,—and by the requirement of ordinary care for the protection of others interested in common with himself. I am aware that the conditions attending the production and sale of natural gas are peculiar. There may be cases where the wasting of gas seems to be the only alternative to permitting another to take it without compensation. How far a court of equity would be influenced by such considerations it is not necessary now to decide, for no such facts appear in this case at present. Upon the whole case I am of the opinion that the injunction should be continued."

Messrs. Lindsey & Parmlee and Ball & Thompson, for appellants:

The plaintiffs' right to an injunction must grow out of the contractual relation between the parties, or some privity of estate, or because of waste, or the commission of trespass. There is no claim that either of the first two relations exists. Nor can the alleged injury be characterized as waste.

Grubb's App. 90 Pa. 234.

Neither is there any act of trespass on the part of the defendants.

The plaintiffs' right to the gas under their leasehold is to so much gas only as may be obtained through the well or wells or openings upon the land owned by them, or embraced within the boundaries of their leasehold.

Westmoreland & C. Nat. Gas Co. v. De Witt, 5 L. R. A. 731, 130 Pa. 235; Duffield v. Rosenzweig, 144 Pa. 537.

The use of the gas is an incident of the ownership, and not the ownership an incident of the use.

The owner is defined to be, "He who has dominion of a thing, real or personal, corporeal or incorporeal, which he has a right to enjoy or do with as he pleases,—even to spoil or destroy it, as far as the law permits, unless he be prevented by some agreement or covenant which restrains his right."

2 Bouvier, Law Dict. 269; Anderson, Law Dict. 741; 1 Bl. Com. 138.

The learned court below has classed natural gas and oil with water. A more natural classification would be among those natural substances which are or are not in themselves the subject of ownership and property.

The substances of light, air, and water are by common consent, and it is believed the universal voice of mankind, not of themselves the subject of property.

See Angell, Watercourses, p. 12, note 1; Race v. Ward, 4 El. & Bl. 702; Haupt's App. 3 L. R. A. 536, 125 Pa. 224; Garber v. Com. 7 Pa. 265; Philadelphia v. Collins, 68 Pa. 116.

It is not so with oil. Whether oil be taken from the ground or from the surface of the earth by a stranger, the owner of the land from which it is taken may retake it.

Gas is also the subject of property of itself, and an action may be had to recover its value without reference to the land.

Kitchen v. Smith, 101 Pa. 452.

Doctrines derived from the analogy between different substances apply along the lines of similarity between those substances, and cease to exist at the point where the similarity between the substances ends.

The principle that a man's ownership of land covers all the land enclosed within vertical lines drawn from the boundaries of his property to the center of the earth, makes the owner of the land the owner of the oil and gas which is contained therein.

The boundary line between the lands of the defendants and the adjoining owners, in the absence of any contractual relation, limits the boundary of their respective rights.

If ownership is dependent on applying to a useful purpose, then plaintiffs have no such right in the gas as will entitle them to maintain these proceedings. Instead of having an absolute property in the gas, their right is a qualified and contingent one. It becomes absolute only when and as they reduce the gas to their possession at the mouth of their wells and apply it to some useful purpose.

Natural gas, like petroleum oil, coal and iron ore, is a mineral, belongs to and is part of the realty.

Punk v. Haldeman, 58 Pa. 229; Stoughton's App. 88 Pa. 198; State v. Indiana & Ohio Oil, Gas & Min. Co. 6 L. R. A. 579, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 758, 120 Ind. 575.

The rights of the owner of the land even to the water which percolates, seeps, or filters through the soil are not qualified, as they are in streams which flow upon the surface of the earth, and well defined watercourses which flow under the earth, but are absolute.

Acton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 324; Chasmore v. Richards, 2 Hurlst. & N. 168; Greenleaf v. Francis, 18 Pick. 117; Roath v. Driscoll, 20 Conn. 533, 53 Am. Dec. 352; Wilson v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 261, 11 Am. Rep. 852; Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 538, 64 Am. Dec. 721; Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49; Frazier v. Brown, 13 Ohio St. 264; Chase v. Siloerstone, 62 Me. 175, 16 Am. Rep. 419; Delhi v. Youmans, 50 Barb. 816; Ellis v. Duncan, 21 Barb. 230; Angell, Watercourses, 7th ed. 174; Brown v. Illius, 27 Conn. 84, 71 Am. Dec. 49.

The reasons given in most of the cases are based on the fact that percolating water is a "part of the soil, or, at least, cannot be distinguished from it, so that if correlative rights as to a flow of percolating water were recognized between adjacent or neighboring owners, the landowner would be deprived of that absolute dominion over his soil which is his by the common law." These reasons apply with still greater force to natural gas.

Westmoreland & C. Nat. Gas Co. v. De Witt, 5 L. R. A. 731, 130 Pa. 235, would seem to draw the analogy between percolating water and gas very closely.

The presence or absence of malice cannot of itself determine the liability of an owner of land for an act done upon it.

Covanhovan v. Hart, 21 Pa. 495, 60 Am. Dec. 57; Jenkins v. Fowler, 24 Pa. 808; Fowler v. Jenkins, 23 Pa. 176; Glendon Iron Co. v. Uhler, 75 Pa. 467, 15 Am. Rep. 599; Mahan v. Brown, 13 Wend. 261, 28 Am. Dec. 461; Clinch v. Myers, 46 N. Y. 511, 7 Am. Rep. 373; Phelps v. Nowlen, 72 N. Y. 89, 28 Am. Rep. 98; South Royallton Bank v. Suffolk Bank, 27 Vt. 505; Chatfield v. Wilson, supra.

The ground that the defendants are not taking the gas for any useful purpose is not sufficient to support this injunction.

Mahan v. Brown and Phelps v. Nowlen, supra; Auburn & C. Pl. Road Co. v. Douglass, 9 N. Y. 444; Chatfield v. Wilson and Frazier v. Brown, supra; Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 514, 84 Am. Dec. 511.

Allowing the gas which they have rightfully taken from their own land to escape into the air, does not render the act wrongful.

Pickard v. Collins, 23 Barb. 444.

Natural gas from its "fugitive and wandering existence" belongs to the owner of the land only while it is in his land and when subject to his control, or within his grasp; but when it escapes and goes into other land or comes under another's control, the title to the former owner is gone.

Westmoreland & C. Nat. Gas Co. v. De Witt, supra; Brown v. Vandergrift, 80 Pa. 147.

Messrs. Roger Sherman and Samuel Grumbine, for appellees:

To absolve one from liability for injuries to others resulting from the use of his property, the use must be proper, ordinary, and natural, and the damage must be unavoidable, that is, resulting solely from the lawful use of one's own.

Collins v. Chartiers Valley Gas Co. 6 L. R. A. 290, 181 Pa. 143; Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 113 Pa. 126, 57 Am. Rep. 445.

If the property is land, and it contains a valuable though volatile product useful to man, and of commercial value, and in every day and general use for the comfort, convenience, and profit of mankind, it could not be called an ordinary and natural use of it to prevent men from using it, to destroy its commercial value and to deprive mankind of its comfort, convenience, and profit.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The learned judge of the court below was quite right in saying that the questions raised in this case "are of great importance and delicacy, and have never been determined in any court." The production of oil and gas in this state has furnished many questions "of great importance and delicacy" that were new, and required to be considered and determined upon facts that were never dreamed of by the sages of the common law. In the treatment of this case it is a matter of first importance to get a clear apprehension of the facts on which the questions are raised. There are two plaintiffs who join in the bill, whose interests, while like in kind, are nevertheless several and distinct. There are several defendants, but their interests appear to be joint. The two plaintiffs hold separate leases on parts of tracts in Warren and Foster counties, Nos. 5,202, 5,203, 5,207, and 5,209, aggregating about 2,200 acres. The gas company began drilling on its leases in 1887. Hague began in 1888. Each has a gas well or wells furnishing gas in sufficient volume to enable the owner to utilize it by transportation to and sale in towns in the vicinity. The defendants are owners and lessees of part of tract No. 5,207, which adjoins the lands of the gas company, and is not far from the lands of Hague. In 1890 they drilled a well on their tract, and obtained gas in considerable volume, but not sufficient to enable them to utilize it by transportation and sale. They have therefore allowed it to escape into the open air. The plaintiffs allege that the "geological formation in that locality" is such that the gas-bearing sand rock underlying all these tracts and forming the common reservoir or deposit from which the gas is obtained "is subject to drainage by the drilling of wells on any part thereof." For this reason they assert that "the flow of gas from the said well of defendants is so great that it will, if allowed to go to waste, seriously and irreparably injure the wells of the plaintiffs by drainage from the lands adjoining and near to said defendants' wells. To prevent this they state that they entered on the defendants' land, and at a cost of about $200 shut in the gas and closed the well. The defendants then threatened to remove the cap or plug and permit the gas to escape again into the air. Upon these facts the plaintiffs asked the court below to enjoin the defendants from removing the cap or plug from the casing or tubing in the well, and from "permitting the gas therefrom to flow into the air, or otherwise go to waste." The injunction was granted, and from that decree this appeal was taken. The affidavits show that the defendants drilled their well in 1890, at the suggestion and request of the gas company, and that negotiations for its purchase by the gas company have been conducted at some length, but without resulting in a bargain. This fact—that the well in controversy had been drilled at considerable cost by the defendants, at the request of the gas company—the learned judge rightly regarded as a significant one. In the opinion filed by him, which is an able one, he says that this fact "might defeat this application so far as the gas company is concerned;" but he regarded it as of no consequence so far as the other plaintiff was concerned, for he immediately added: "But, as it cannot affect the plaintiff Hague, it is not necessary to consider it at this time." He then proceeds to state and consider the question on which his decree was based, upon a state of facts such as might arise where an adjoining owner was guilty of malice or negligence in the conduct of operations on his land resulting naturally in injury to his neighbor. But is this conclusion of the learned judge that Hague stood on higher ground than the gas company a correct one? The acts complained of were the drilling of the well in 1890, when the wells of both the plaintiffs were in full operation, and the subsequent failure to utilize or shut in the gas. The drilling of the well was accounted for, and the suggestion of malice or negligence therein negatived by proof that it was done at the instance of the gas company. This company had a considerable gas plant, and was engaged in the supply of gas to its customers for fuel. It was interested in the development of the region, and evidently expected to buy the defendants' well if it was of sufficient size to be capable of utilization. The defendants and the gas company could not agree upon the price of the well after it was drilled, but the fact that it was drilled at the request of the company, and not of the mere motion of the defendants, was an answer to any allegation of malice or negligence on the part of Hague as well as on the part of the company, since it accounted for the act of drilling by assigning a motive therefor, both lawful and neighborly. It will not do to say that an act thus accounted for as to one plaintiff may be assumed to be the result of malice or negligence as to the other, in the absence of proof to sustain the assertion. These plaintiffs stand on common ground. Neither of them can complain of the defendants for the act of drilling the well on their land on any other ground than the existence of malice or negligence. When the act is accounted for in such a manner as to show that it was not done with malice, or in negligence, but in good faith, as an act of ownership, and at the solicitation of the gas company, the character of the act is established, and as a basis of relief it falls out of the case. What have we then? Three landowners owning considerable holdings in the same basin, or overlying the same gas-bearing sand rock, each having an open gas well or wells on his land, drilled without malice or negligence, in a lawful manner, and for a lawful purpose. Two of these owners have been able to utilize the gas from their respective lands and find a market for it. One of them has not been so fortunate. He has gas from his well, but up to the time of the filing of this bill he has not been able to utilize or dispose of it, and his gas has gone to waste for that reason. His more fortunate neighbors come into a court of equity, and ask that he shall not be permitted to let his gas run, because, while this gas is his own, underlying his tract, and finding its way to the surface through his well, it has a tendency to drain the sand rock, and so to reduce ultimately the flow of gas from their wells. This would be equally true if the defendants were able to utilize their gas; yet it is conceded that in that case their right to the gas from their well would be as incontestable as the right of the plaintiffs to use the gas from theirs. How is that right lost? By their inability to find a purchaser? If they can find a purchaser, or turn the gas to any useful purpose, their right to the gas that flows from their well is conceded. If they cannot, their right is denied. Their well must be shut in, while their successful neighbors drain the entire basin through their open wells, and receive pay for the gas. This is a proposition to limit the power of the owner over his own by the use he is able to make of it. If he can sell his gas or his oil, or turn it to some practical purpose, his power over it as owner is unabridged. If he cannot find a purchaser, or a practical purpose to which to apply his yield of gas or oil, then his power as owner is gone. This would be an adaptation to actual business of the spiritual truth that "to him that hath shall be given; but from him that hath not shall be taken away, even that which he seemeth to have."

Does the maxim, "sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas," require us to grant the relief sought in this case? If in burning the gas from their well the defendants should direct the jet towards the plaintiffs' buildings or timber, or should leave it uncontrolled, so that the wind might drive it against or towards the plaintiffs' property so as to injure or endanger it, a case would be presented in which the maxim would be applicable, and we should take pleasure in enforcing it. If the defendants' well produced nothing, and they were leaving it without plugging, so that the water might find its way into the sand rock, to the injury of others, we could punish them under the statute which prescribes the manner of plugging an unproductive well, and makes it obligatory on the owner to adopt it. But we have a well drilled for a lawful purpose, in a lawful manner, and actually producing gas, which is not directed towards the property of another, or so consumed as to affect the buildings, timber, or crops of any adjoining owner. It is therefore not the use of the gas of which the plaintiffs complain. It is the production of it when the owner cannot sell it or turn it to any practical purpose. Now, it is doubtless true that the public has a sufficient interest in the preservation of oil and gas from waste to justify legislation upon this subject. Something has been done in this direction already by the acts regulating the plugging of abandoned wells, but it is not the public interest that is involved in this litigation. It is the interest of an adjoining owner who seeks to appropriate to himself so much of his neighbor's gas as he cannot turn into money or use for some practical business purpose, and he asks a court of equity to hold his neighbor's hands by an injunction until this appropriation is accomplished. We cannot find any rule of law or any principle of equity on which such an injunction can rest. The scope of the golden rule may be sufficiently ample to cover this case, and it may be that it would require an owner to surrender to his neighbor so much of his own property as he could not turn to his own advantage, if his neighbor was so situated that he could profit by it. Assuming this to be so, the moral obligation so arising is not enforceable by civil process. The owner of timber may pile it in heaps, and burn it, as was done in the early settlement of the country, notwithstanding the fact that his neighbor has a sawmill and all the facilities for preparing the sawed lumber for market and converting it into money. The power of the owner of the timber over it is neither greater nor less because of his neighbor's readiness and ability to market it. An owner of land may have a deposit of coal under some portion of it so small in extent, or with such an inclination, as to make it impossible for him to mine through his own tract without a greater cost to him than the value of the mined coal when brought to the surface. His neighbor may have an open mine that reaches it, and through which it could be brought at a fair profit. These circumstances do not affect the title of the owner of the coal, or confer any right on the adjoining mine owner; but it is said that the oil and gas are unlike the solid minerals, since they may move through the interstitial spaces or crevices in the sand rocks in search of an opening through which they may escape from the pressure to which they are subject. This is probably true. It is one of the contingencies to which this species of property is subject. But the owner of the surface is an owner downward to the center, until the underlying strata have been severed from the surface by sale. What is found within the boundaries of his tract belongs to him according to its nature. The air and the water he may use. The coal and iron or other solid minerals he may mine and carry away. The oil and gas he may bring to the surface and sell in like manner to be carried away and consumed. His dominion is, upon general principles, as absolute over the fluid as the solid minerals. It is exercised in the same manner, and with the same results. He cannot estimate the quantity in place of gas or oil, as he might of the solid minerals. He cannot prevent its movement away from him, towards an outlet on some other person's land, which may be more or less rapid, depending on the dip of the rock or the coarseness of the sand composing it; but so long as he can reach it and bring it to the surface it is his absolutely, to sell, to use, to give away, or to squander, as in the case of his other property. In the disposition he may make of it he is subject to two limitations: he must not disregard his obligations to the public, he must not disregard his neighbor's rights. If he uses his product in such a manner as to violate any rule of public policy or any positive provision of the written law, he brings himself within the reach of the courts. If the use he makes of his own, or its waste, is injurious to the property or the health of others, such use or waste may be restrained, or damages recovered therefor; but, subject to these limitations, his power as an owner is absolute, until the legislature shall, in the interest of the public as consumers, restrict and regulate it by statute.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and the injunction is dissolved.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA.

Annie COMITIS
v.

W. S. PARKERSON et al.

(56 Fed. Rep. 558.)

1. Expatriation must be effected by removal from the country.
2. The relation of husband and wife is not inconsistent with one being a citizen and the other an alien.
3. In the absence of any act of congress authorizing it, there can be no implied renunciation of citizenship by an American woman marrying an alien.

4. A woman citizen of the United States who never intends to leave the country, and never, in fact, does leave it, does not become expatriated and become an alien by marriage with a subject of Italy, who, previous to his marriage has settled in the United States without intent to return to Italy, but who has never taken any steps toward naturalization.

(June 17, 1893.)

NOTE.—Effect of marriage on wife's status as an alien.

This question is one which has not been definitely solved, and the contrariety of opinion upon it shows it to be difficult of solution. The doubt arises as to what effect should be given to modern statutes on naturalization and expatriation.

The ancient doctrine.

At the time when the existence of a right of voluntary expatriation was not recognized and there was little if any provision for naturalization the question was comparatively simple and the decisions are uniform.

The old doctrine was that an alien is not entitled to dower. Bacon, Abr. Alien, c. Dower, a; Comyns, Dir. Alien, chap. 1, Dower, a, 2; Co. Litt. 81 b; 2 Bl. Com. 181.

But by Statute 8 Hen. V., the alien wife might have dower if married by license of the king.

In accordance with that doctrine it was held that an alien widow of a subject is not endowable. Priest v. Cummings, 16 Wend. 617; Greer v. Sankston, 28 How. Pr. 471; Du Bouchet v. Award of Commission, 2 Knapp, P. C. 364.

So an alien widow of a natural born citizen cannot be endowed. Mick v. Mick, 10 Wend. 380.

And naturalization of the husband does not remove the disability of the alien wife to be endowed. Sutliff v. Forgey, 1 Cow. 86; Delaney v. Seymour, 5 Cow. 715; Connolly v. Smith, 21 Wend. 59; Currin v. Finn, 3 Denio, 229.

So an alien wife does not become a naturalized citizen by the naturalization of her husband. White v. White, 2 Met. (Ky.) 185.

In Kelly v. Harrison, 2 Johns. Cas. 29, 1 Am. Dec. 154, it was held that a wife who remained in Ireland when her husband came to America and who was separated from him for nearly thirty years could not claim dower in his estate, he having become an American citizen, since there was evidence of a permanent separation, under which circumstances the citizenship of the wife did not follow that of the husband.

And the converse was also held that neither the marriage of a woman native born to an alien nor her residence in a foreign country constitutes her an alien. Beck v. McGillis, 9 Barb. 35.

So the marriage with an alien whether friend or enemy produces no dissolution of the native allegiance of the wife. It may change her civil rights, but it does not affect her political rights or privileges. The general doctrine is that no person can by any act of his own, without the consent of the government, put off his allegiance and become an alien. Shanks v. Dupont, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 242, 7 L. ed. 666.

But it was held in that case that if she departed with her husband from our territory at the close of the war, her future allegiance was fixed by the treaty of peace to the British crown.

It was held that if the woman goes to a foreign country with her husband and remains there for ten years after his death, and expresses the intention of remaining there indefinitely, it will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that she took the necessary steps to become a citizen there. Alsberry v. Hawkins, 9 Dana, 177.

But a wife who, in duty bound, has shared the lot of her husband and abides by his choice during coverture, ought to be allowed at its termination to have the privilege of electing for herself, and of fixing not only her future but her past character. Her acquiescence in his choice, however willing, ought not to be considered as her own free independent act, but is the effect of that dependence and constraint which by law, as well as by nature, belong to her condition. If, therefore, after the husband's death she returns to her native country and resumes her residence and citizenship there, it

PLEA to the jurisdiction of the court over an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of plaintiff's husband. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. A. O'Sullivan, City Atty., for defendant City of New Orleans, and H. C. Miller and Charles F. Buck for defendants Parkerson et al., in support of the plea.

Mr. John Q. Flynn for plaintiff, contra.

Billings, District Judge, delivered the following opinion:

This case is submitted on a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. The defendants are citizens of Louisiana. The question is whether the plaintiff is an alien. The admitted facts are these: The plaintiff was a native born citizen of the state of Louisiana. On the 30th day of July, in the year 1881, in Louisiana, she intermarried with Loretto Comitès, who was a native born subject of the kingdom of Italy, and had several years previous to that time immigrated from Italy, and established his residence in New Orleans, where he engaged in business, and where he, up to the time of his marriage, and he and his wife, after his marriage, continued to reside, it being at all times after his coming to Louisiana his purpose not to return to Italy to reside, but to continue to reside in Louisiana. After his death his wife continued to reside in Louisiana, and at no time had she the purpose to remove to Italy. The question may be generalized thus: Does a woman who was a citizen of the United States, who never intended to leave it, and never did leave it, become expatriated and become an alien by marriage with a man who had been a subject of Italy, but who, previous to his marriage, had settled in Louisiana, and had forever severed himself from Italy?

The arguments on both sides have conceded (what could hardly be denied) that the tie which binds together a government and its subjects or citizens, and which creates the reciprocal obligations of protection and obedience, can be dissolved only in such a mode as has the assent of both parties; that, so far as concerns the government, this assent must be expressly made, or must be inferred from the fundamental or statutory provisions by which the action of the government involved is regulated. A change of the allegiance due to the United States, a throwing of it off on the part of a citizen, involves on the part of the government an acquiescence from that department of government which, according to its constitution, must acquiesce in it; and, on the part of the citizen, the manifestation of the purpose to expatriate himself by some unequivocal act, which must also be recognized by the government to be adequate for that purpose.

I shall consider the question in two aspects: First, has the government of the United States in any way authorized or sanctioned the withdrawal of the plaintiff's allegiance to itself? and, secondly, do the facts of the case show a purpose on the part of the plaintiff to withdraw and transfer her allegiance?

should be assumed that she merely submitted herself temporarily to the domain of the foreign country, without having renounced her native allegiance, that she never became an alien, and that her property rights remain as though she had never been out of her native country. Moore v. Tisdale, 5 B. Mon. 362.

The doctrine since the enactment of modern statutes.

In 1855 the United States adopted a law making the naturalization of the husband confer citizenship on the wife.

And the United States Revised Statutes, § 1999, gives the right of expatriation.

Both England and France have statutes similar to that of the United States, making an alien woman who marries one of their subjects herself a subject. 7 & 8 Vict. chap. 66; French Civil Code, art. 12. And each country also recognizes the right of expatriation.

Opinion is not uniform as to the effect to be given to this legislation. The opinion in COMITIS V. PARKERSON, shows the diverse opinions which the attorneys-general of the United States have held.

The opinions of law writers appear to be no more uniform.

Morse (Citizenship, § 98) quotes Calvo (Derecho Internacional, vol. 1, p. 238) to the effect that the marriage of a woman with a foreigner will change her nationality according to the legislation of nearly all the nations of Europe and America. Again (§ 101) he quotes Demangeat (Condition Civile des Étrangers en France) that the act of marrying an alien is a voluntary act of the woman which brings about the change of nationality. But he subsequently (§ 102) quotes Demangeat DeDelvincourt, de Duranton, de Demante and de Valette as insisting that the national character of the woman is not necessarily and without her consent changed absolutely as an unavoidable incident of marriage.

Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in his work on Nationality (p. 216) adopts the view that the nationality of a married woman should always follow that of the husband, whether original or acquired.

Field in his outlines of an International Code (sec. 259) says: "The marriage of a woman in her own country with a foreigner domiciled therein should certainly not denationalize her." But (sec. 260): "If before or after her marriage the domicile of the woman is permanently removed from the territory of the nation to which she previously belonged, she acquires by such marriage and removal the national character of her husband."

Morse himself says, section 137, the original citizenship or nationality of a woman is acquired or lost as an incident of marriage.

In several cases before the Mixed Commission on British and American claims, provided for by the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, women born within the United States and always domiciled there were allowed standing before the Commission as British subjects. Report of Her Majesty's Agent on the Mixed Commission of British and American Claims, pp. 337-341.

The Commission on Mexican and American Claims under Treaty of July 4, 1868, held that a married woman by the mere fact of marriage invests herself with the nationality of her husband, without the necessity of any more manifest expression of her wish. Martin's Case, Rodriguez History, page 26.

Although one of the opinions of the Commission elsewhere stated that marriage to a foreigner does not necessarily deprive the wife of the national character of origin, citing Case of Mary Diencourt, No. 235, before United States and Mexican Claims Commission, Washington, D. C.

First, as to any authority or sanction of the government of the United States. There can be no doubt but that the department of government which, in the distribution of authority under the constitution, has power over the subject of naturalization, has it also over the subject of expatriation. The Constitution is silent on the subject of expatriation; but article 1, § 8, par. 4, provides that "congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Where the Constitution is thus silent as to who can denationalize, that department which can nationalize must be held to have authority to expatriate. Since the decision of Chirac v. Chirac, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 260, 269, 4 L. ed. 234, 236, that power has been settled to be vested exclusively in congress.

Down to the Act of July 27, 1868, the question of right of expatriation and its limitations had been considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the following cases: The Santissima Trinidad, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 283, 5 L. ed. 454; Talbot v. Janson, 8 U. S. 3 Dall. 133, 1 L. ed. 540; Inglis v. Sailors Snug Harbor Trustees, 28 U. S. 8 Pet. 99, 7 L. ed. 617; and Shanks v. Dupont, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 242, 7 L. ed. 686. There is also an able exposition of the subject given by Chief Justice Ellsworth in his opinion in the Case of Isaac Williams, 1 Tucker, Bl. Com. pt. 1, Append. 486, cited in Murray v. Charming Betsy, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 82, 2 L. ed. 214, note. The law established in these cases is thus summarized by Chancellor Kent, 2 Com. *49: "The better opinion would seem to be that a citizen cannot renounce his allegiance to the United States without the permission of government, to be declared by law; and that, as there is no existing legislative regulation on the case, the rule of the English common law (perpetual allegiance) remains unaltered."

This doctrine upon the matter of expatriation was declared and reiterated and inflexibly maintained, notwithstanding congress had, from the year 1802, permitted an alien, in being naturalized in the United States, to abjure his native allegiance without any release of it from his former sovereign. The inconsistency of the theory of perpetual allegiance with the admission of foreigners to citizenship by requiring them simply to renounce for themselves all preceding allegiance was admitted by the supreme court in Shanks v. Dupont, supra, and by Judge Kent, but it was tacitly admitted by both the court and the commentator that no power could correct the inconsistency or deal with the subject save congress. Congress, on the 27th of July, 1868 (15 Stat. at L. 223), passed the act entitled "An Act Concerning the Rights of American Citizens in Foreign States." It is to be observed that the act itself, as does its title, deals only with the protection of aliens by birth who have become citizens by naturalization. As to them, it declares it to be the determination of the United States to accord to them, when in foreign states, the same protection as is accorded to native born citizens similarly situated. The whole scope and force of the act, when most liberally construed, even when expanded by the more general terms of the preamble, declares that naturalized citizens, having, according to the principles of our government, the same rights as native born citizens, shall have by law the same protection abroad. As to whether allegiance can be acquired or lost by any other means than

The uniform doctrine of the courts under these statutes seems to be that marriage of an alien woman with a citizen makes her a citizen regardless of her actual domicile.

Under the Act of February 10, 1855, the citizenship of the husband whenever it exists confers citizenship on the wife. Kelly v. Owen, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 496, 19 L. ed. 233; United States v. Kellar, 11 Biss. 814; People v. Newell, 38 Hun, 78; Luhrs v. Eimer, 80 N. Y. 171; Leonard v. Grant, 5 Fed. Rep. 11, 11 Rep. 327, 6 Sawy. 603; Gumm v. Hubbard, 97 Mo. 811.

A woman married abroad to a citizen of this country becomes herself a citizen, although she never comes here. Halsey v. Beer, 52 Hun, 366.

An alien whose husband becomes naturalized thereby herself becomes a citizen, although she may have been living at a distance from him for years and never comes to the United States until after his death. Headman v. Rose, 63 Ga. 453.

The fact that the woman always continued to reside abroad is of no consequence under the act of congress. Kane v. McCarthy, 63 N. C. 299.

If the husband is a citizen, the wife will be a citizen. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Gorbach, 70 Pa. 150.

The citizenship of the woman will not be prevented, under the act of congress, by the facts that her husband was naturalized after the marriage, that she had not resided in this country for five years and was under twenty-one years of age. Renner v. Muller, 12 Jones & S. 535.

In Burton v. Burton, 1 Keyes, 350, Mullen, J., held that under the act of congress, only those women become citizens by marriage who are entitled to 22 L. R. A.

naturalization; and to be entitled to naturalization one must be a resident in this country, hence an alien wife, who has never resided in this country, does not become a citizen by the naturalization of her husband. But the majority of the court did not agree with him, and it was held that the naturalization of the husband naturalized the wife, although she had never been in this country.

An alien woman who has married a subject is no longer entitled to the statutory privileges of an alien. Reg. v. Manning, 2 Car. & K. 884.

When the contingency of a citizen woman marrying an alien domiciled here is viewed in the light of the above legislation, and of the probable course which foreign courts would take in reference to her citizenship as judged from the decisions which courts in this country have made in regard to women marrying citizens of the country and remaining abroad it would seem that she should be treated as an alien.

So it has been held that a French woman who has become naturalized under the statute by a marriage with an American citizen will again become an alien, capable of suing in the federal courts, by a second marriage to a French citizen residing in this country. Pequignot v. Detroit, 16 Fed. Rep. 211.

But it has also been held that the citizenship of a foreign born woman who has become an American citizen by marrying one is not lost by the death of her husband and her subsequent intermarrying with an alien so as to prevent her minor children from acquiring the rights of citizenship. Kreitz v. Behrensmeyer, 125 Ill. 141. H. P. F.

statutory naturalization is left by congress in precisely the same situation as it was before the passage of this act. During the year 1863, and since, five treaties have been entered into between the United States and foreign governments based upon this statute, in which the right of expatriation is dealt with, (which will be referred to hereafter;) and in all these treaties the right is confined, as is the statute, to that of citizens or subjects of our country who have become citizens or subjects of others by direct statutory naturalization. So that with reference to the question before the court, the law is left where it was previous to the year 1868, and congress has made no law authorizing any implied renunciation of citizenship.

I think the conclusion might be rested here. But, even if congress, in the preamble to the Act of 1868, had meant to declare that there might be expatriation effected in connection with other means than by naturalization abroad, the settled doctrine as to expatriation would prevent the plaintiff from being regarded as expatriated. Expatriation must be effected by removal from the country. It cannot be denied that whatever right of expatriation congress meant to declare by the act of 1868 is in the express language of the preamble based entirely upon the inborn right to seek happiness by free removal from one country to another. It could not, therefore, have been intended by congress in that act that citizens should expatriate themselves, and remain permanently within the country. The right is limited to or conditioned upon actual removal, by the public writers. Puffendorf, in his Law of Nations (Book 8, chap. 11, § 2), says: "But now the usual way by which subjection ceases is when a man by permission of his own commonwealth voluntarily removes into another, and settles himself and his effects and the hopes of his fortune there."

And again, in section 3, he says: "But then it must be observed that by removing in this place I understand the departing out of the dominions and territories of the commonwealth, and not the changing its authority, and continuing to live in its dominions."

Some light may be obtained upon the subject by considering the laws of the states before the adoption of the constitution. All were adverse to the right to expatriate save Virginia and Pennsylvania. I have not had access to the act of Pennsylvania. That of Virginia is given in Talbot v. Janson, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 136, 1 L. ed. 541, note. The words of the law are these: "Whosoever any citizen of this commonwealth, shall, by deed in writing, under his hand and seal, executed in the presence of, and subscribed by, three witnesses, and by them, or two of them, proved in the general court, any district court, or the court of the county or corporation where he resides, or by open verbal declaration made in either of the said courts, to be by them entered of record, declare that he relinquishes the character of a citizen, and shall depart out of this commonwealth, such persons shall, from the time of his departure, be considered as having exercised his right of expatriation, and shall thenceforth be deemed no citizen."

It will be seen from this statute that to effect the expatriation the citizens must make or have passed in a court of record a public declaration of his renunciation, but that, even after this had been done and recorded, the citizenship ceased not until from the time of the departure from the commonwealth. Whenever the subject has been referred to by the United States Supreme Court the same view has been taken. In The Santissima Trinidad, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 283, 5 L. ed. 454, Justice Story, at page 348, L. ed. 470, after declining to express an opinion upon the general question of the right of an American citizen, independently of the authority of a legislative act, to throw off his allegiance to his native country, adds: "It is perfectly clear that this cannot be done without a bona fide change of domicile."

The syllabus in Talbot v. Janson, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 138, 1 L. ed. 540, as prepared by Justice Curtis in his decisions of the Supreme Court (vol. 1, p. 128), states the doctrine of that case upon this point to be: "If the right of expatriation exists, not only a renunciation of citizenship of the United States but actual removal for some lawful purpose and the acquisition of a domicile elsewhere are necessary to effect it."

See also The Dos Hermanos, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 76, 98, 4 L. ed. 189, 194, where the court says that, even if Mr. Miller had been expatriated by his resumption of domicile in the United States, he became a "reintegrated citizen."

To the same effect is the doctrine of the five treaties above referred to. Those treaties were: A treaty with the North German Confederacy (15 Stat. at L. 615); a treaty with Bavaria (Id. 661); a treaty with Wurttemberg (16 Stat. at L. 735); with Hesse, (Id. 743); and Ecuador (18 Stat. at L. 69). These treaties, as has been remarked, reciprocally give effect to the naturalization of the citizens or subjects of either government in the country of the other. So dependent is this recognition of change of allegiance upon actual change of country that in each treaty there is the same article as to the effect to be given to a return to the native country animus manendi. For instance, in the treaty with the king of Prussia (15 Stat. at L. 616), article 4 provides: "If an American naturalized in North Germany renews his residence in the United States, without the intent to return to North Germany, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in North Germany."

Alsberry v. Hawkins, 9 Dana, 177, 38 Am. Dec. 546, is one of the few American cases which, following the law of Virginia, the parent state of Kentucky, maintains the right of expatriation. But the court there held that expatriation must be actual; there must be a going forth from the country allegiance to which is surrendered.

My conclusion, therefore, is that from the utterances of the public writers, of the supreme court, and the provisions of the treaties, even if congress meant to imply that ex-patriline from the United States might be effected by means other than naturalization in a foreign country, it must have meant that it should be conditioned upon actual departure from the country.

It does not affect the conclusion that the domicile of the wife was controlled by that of the husband. Whether decided by her or by one whom she had authorized to decide for her, the fact of her residence here, with the purpose on the part of her husband and herself to remain here always, is, as it seems to me, both upon principle and authority, an insuperable obstacle in the way of her ceasing to be considered a citizen of the United States. Nor does it seem to me that the Act of Congress of February 10, 1855 (10 Stat. at L. 604; Rev. Stat. § 1994), which provides that an alien woman by marriage with a citizen shall become a citizen, authorizes any inference that congress meant to declare the converse, viz., that a citizen woman by marriage with an alien should become an alien. The law is in such well-considered and guarded terms as to forbid any extension of it by implication. The public policy of the United States on the subject of immigration has been based upon its interests. A continent was to be populated. Vast tracts of land were to be settled and occupied chiefly by foreigners. Therefore congress has uniformly encouraged and fostered the immigration and naturalization of foreigners in every proper way. Lynch v. Clarke, 1 Sandf. Ch. 657, 7 L. ed. 469, and Chief Justice Ellis—worth's opinion in the Case of Isaac Williams, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 82, 2 L. ed. 214, note. Again, congress considered the investiture of an alien with the rights of citizenship as an advantage in the reception of which acquiescence might be presumed, which would be far from true as to the loss of those rights by a citizen. The relation of husband and wife was dealt with by congress only in the furtherance of this public policy of the nation, and the statute was not intended as a general enactment upon the consequences of marriage between people of different nationalities. Therefore, as it seems to me, if inference is to be resorted to upon the subject, the motive on the part of congress for making an alien woman a citizen by her marriage with a citizen would have been the very reason for its not intending the converse,—that a citizen woman by marrying an alien should become an alien.

The relation of husband and wife is not inconsistent with one being a citizen and the other being an alien. In Priest v. Cummings, 16 Wend. 617, 626, the supreme court of New York, Judge Nelson afterwards Mr. Justice Nelson, being the organ of the court, held that in the act of congress, known as the "Naturalization Act," the words, "any alien being a free white person," included an alien married woman, and that an alien wife might be naturalized without the concurrence of her husband; Judge Nelson quoting from the opinion of Shanks v. Dupont, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 248, 7 L. ed. 668, to the effect that "the incapacities of married women do not affect their political rights, nor prevent them from acquiring or losing a national character; that their political rights do not stand upon the doctrines of municipal law, but upon the more general principles of the law of nations." If the doctrines of international law and our own naturalization statute sanction a married woman becoming a citizen for herself and without the concurrence of her husband, how shall the fact of a woman's marriage with an alien born husband, who has cast off forever all political connection with any country save this, and has settled here for life, work ipso facto an undeclared implied surrender of her citizenship? In Beck v. McGillis, 9 Barb. 35, it was held that the marriage of a female with an alien did not render her an alien, so as to prevent her taking real estate by dower.

I have so far considered the question submitted with reference to any assent on the part of the government to a renunciation of allegiance on the part of the plaintiff. Very much of what I have said bears upon the remaining point to be considered,—whether the plaintiff has herself done any act which, by fair intentment, manifested a purpose of voluntarily withdrawing her allegiance from the United States. The plaintiff is in this case claiming a privilege acquired, but the case must be determined upon precisely the same considerations as if the question arose upon an objection interposed against her claim of a right, such as if she was setting up a right of dower, and it was claimed she had become an alien. In either case the question would be the same,—has the plaintiff by her marriage with Comitis renounced her citizenship of the United States? According to the facts of the case, Comitis several years before the marriage settled here with a purpose to withdraw altogether from Italy, his native country, and never to leave this country, which purpose he retained till the time of his death. The plaintiff herself never left the country, and never intended to leave. The inference to be drawn from the plaintiff's marriage with Comitis, under these circumstances, as it seems to me, is that the plaintiff meant to retain, and her husband ultimately to acquire, citizenship in the United States. According to the doctrine laid down by the English courts, especially by Sir William Scott, and reiterated by the United States Supreme Court in The Venus, 19 U. S. 8 Cranch, 255, 8 L. ed. 554, in case of a war between the United States and Italy, if Comitis (doing less than is shown to have been done by him in his case towards making this his permanent domicile) "had removed to this country, settled himself here, and engaged in the trade of the country, he would have furnished such evidence of an intention permanently to reside here as would have stamped him with the national character" of the United States. Page 279, 8 L. ed. 562. I cannot see how, if these circumstances would have stamped upon him the national character, with respect to his goods on the high seas, they should not be considered as stamping the same national character upon him as a husband in the opinion of the woman who was about to marry him, and thus furnish a clear indication of the intent on her part not to renounce the protection of the government of the country in which she and he intended to continue to reside. Both the husband and wife intended this country as their permanent domicile. By virtue of his settlement and residence here the constitution makes his children citizens of the United States. By reason of his settlement and residence here the courts adjudge his property, when outside of all countries, that of a citizen. If the controlling circumstances of a man's life render his children and his property American, can a union with him by marriage be held to indicate a purpose on the part of the wife to expatriate herself and render herself an Italian? If, even when renunciation of allegiance is permitted, express renunciation is not allowed except when accompanied by actual departure from the country, a fortiori, remaining and intending to remain in one's native country permanently forbid any withdrawal from allegiance by implication.

My conclusion, for the reasons which I have thus stated, is that on the questions of naturalization and expatriation the judgment of the courts must not outrun the action of congress, and that the courts must carefully observe the lines of demarcation which the congress has drawn; that any imperfections or inconsistencies in those lines must be supplied and corrected by congress, and not by the courts; and that the laws of congress do not authorize, nor do her own acts impute, any cessation of her citizenship of the United States. Four attorney-generals of the United States have given opinions upon the question as to the effect of a female citizen marrying an alien husband. Two have held that she became an alien, two that she remained a citizen. One of the present justices of the supreme court, when he was district judge, whose every opinion has my great respect, due not more to his elevated position than to his commanding fitness for it, came to the opposite conclusion to that which I have reached. Pequignot v. Detroit, 16 Fed. Rep. 211. But in that case the facts characterizing the residence of the husband and wife may have made it what the public writers term temporary residence, whereas the intent of the plaintiff and her husband was to remain in the United States always.

I think the plea must be maintained, and the suit dismissed without prejudice.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Burdella PARROT et al.

v.

Miles W. AVERY, Appt.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The bare fact that a deed retained by the grantor without recording during his lifetime was executed in the presence of a witness is not sufficient to show that it was delivered during his life.
2. A gift by will of a chest and its contents does not operate as a devise of land, by reason of the fact that an undelivered deed of the land to the same person was in the chest.

(October 20, 1898.)

APPEAL by the tenant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Berkshire County in favor of demandants in an action brought to recover the possession of certain real estate which the tenant claimed under a deed executed by his grandfather, Miles Avery, deceased, but which demandants alleged was never delivered, and also under a clause of testator's will giving the tenant the chest and its contents, among which was the deed in question. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. A. Chalkley Collins, for demandants, appellees:

The tenant cannot acquire title under his deed unless there was a valid delivery of the deed by the grantor during his lifetime. Delivery is an indispensable requisite to the validity of a deed.

Shurtleff v. Francis, 118 Mass. 154; Stone v. French, 37 Kan. 145; Weisinger v. Cock, 67 Miss. 511; Porter v. Woodhouse, 59 Conn. 568; Stillwell v. Hubbard, 20 Wend. 44; Wellborn v. Weaver, 17 Ga. 267. 63 Am. Dec. 245, notes.

The mere manual transfer of the deed from the executor to the tenant cannot constitute a delivery.

Fay v. Richardson, 7 Pick. 91.

The tenant cannot take under the will, as there is no attempt on the part of the testator to convey the property by his will, except in the residuary clause. The testator does not refer to the deed in his will nor try to make it a part of the will, nor is there any evidence of any desire or intention on his part to do so.

1 Jarman, Wills, p. 741; Newton v. Seaman's Friend Soc. 130 Mass. 91, 39 Am. Rep. 433.

Mr. Herbert C. Joyner, for tenant, appellant:

The executors of the will, agreeable to its provisions, handed over said deed to the tenant. He accepted it, had it recorded, and took possession of the premises before this action was brought. Has there not been a delivery of this deed sufficient to give the tenant a title?

Where a deed is delivered to a third person for the grantee and is handed by that person to the grantee after the death of the grantor it is a good delivery and takes effect from the time it was first handed over to the third person.

NOTE.—It appears in the brief of counsel, though not stated by the court, that the attestation clause signed by the witness to the deed stated in the usual form that it was "signed, sealed, and delivered" in his presence, thus raising the question of the effect of such recital as evidence of delivery. 23 L. R. A.

Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Mass. 307, 6 Am. Dec. 67; Foster v. Mansfield, 5 Met. 413, 37 Am. Dec. 154.

If the court finds that it was the intention of Miles Avery to have this deed take effect at the time it was executed "signed, sealed, and delivered," it will be considered a delivered deed and transfer the title, although it was not actually handed over until after the grantor's death, and was never beyond the control of the grantor.

Sneathen v. Sneathen, 104 Mo. 201.

A deed may operate as a deed, although not actually handed over to the grantee until after the death or other disability of the grantor.

Wheelwright v. Wheelwright, 2 Mass. 447, 3 Am. Dec. 66.

A deed may be handed over by the administrator of a deceased grantor, where there has been a constructive delivery by the deceased in his lifetime, and it will operate as the deed of the grantor, taking effect from the time of the constructive delivery.

Ray v. Richardson, 7 Pick. 91.

When an instrument of conveyance is sealed and delivered with an intention on the part of the grantor that it shall operate immediately and there is nothing to qualify the delivery but keeping the deed in the hands of the grantor, it is a valid and effectual deed in law and equity. The execution of the deed in the presence of an attesting witness is sufficient evidence from which to infer a delivery.

Moore v. Hazelton, 9 Allen, 102.

The deed may remain with the grantor and it will be a good delivery if there are other acts and declarations sufficient to show an intention to treat it as delivered.

Regan v. Howe, 121 Mass. 424.

There is such reference to the deed in the will as to give the deed a testamentary character.

A testator may refer to deeds and other instruments or monuments or existing facts so as to make them part of his will.

Thayer v. Wellington, 9 Allen, 283, 85 Am. Dec. 753; Newton v. Seaman's Friend Soc. 130 Mass. 91, 89 Am. Rep. 433; Thompson v. Lloyd, 49 Pa. 128.

Should the court hold that there is such reference to this deed in the will of Miles Avery as to give the deed a testamentary character it is competent for the tenant now to offer to have the deed admitted to probate as a part of the will.

Newton v. Seaman's Friend Soc. 130 Mass. 91, 39 Am. Rep. 433; Waters v. Stickney, 12 Allen, 1, 90 Am. Dec. 122.

If testator refer to monuments or existing facts so that his purpose as to a particular legatee and the character of the legacy is shown to be fully settled, the law gives the legatee the benefit of the legacy.

Smart v. Prujean, 6 Ves. Jr. 580; Habergham v. Vincent, 2 Ves. Jr. 228.

The plain and lawful intent of the testator must not be defeated.

King v. Melling, 1 Vent. 231; Doe v. Lamington, 2 Burr. 1112.

Where a promissory note of the testator was held void as a note it was held good as a legacy. Loring v. Sumner, 23 Pick. 98.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The agreed facts fail to show a delivery of the deed in the grantor's lifetime. The grantor retained control of the deed and of the land. There was no prior bargain with the grantee, and no indebtedness to him nor relation of trust towards him. He has no knowledge of the execution of the deed. The only consideration was love and affection. The deed was not recorded during the grantor's lifetime. There was no oral declaration by the grantor that he meant to have it take effect at once. In short, there was nothing tending to show a delivery of the deed except the bare fact that it was executed in the presence of a witness. The question of delivery is a question of fact, and delivery in the grantor's lifetime must be proved. There must have been an intention that it should operate as a present conveyance of title. A finding of the delivery of the deed would not be warranted on the agreed facts. Stevens v. Stevens, 150 Mass. 557; Shurtleff v. Francis, 118 Mass. 154; Harvok v. Pike, 105 Mass. 560, 7 Am. Rep. 554; Brabrook v. Boston Five Cent Sav. Bank, 104 Mass. 228, 232, 6 Am. Rep. 222; Olase v. Breed, 5 Gray, 440; Younge v. Guilbeau, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 636, 641, 18 L. ed. 262, 263; 8 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 299 et seq. There were no acts or declarations of the grantor sufficient to show an intent to treat it as delivered, or circumstances such as were found to be sufficient in Lowd v. Brigham, 154 Mass. 107, 113, 114, and cases there cited, and in Regan v. Howe, 121 Mass. 424.

2. Even though it be assumed that the undelivered deed was in the chest when the will was signed, the gift in the will of "my chest and its contents, except the bank books," does not operate as a devise of the land. The danger of using words of this kind in a will is pointed out by Chitty, J., in Robson v. Hamilton [1891], 2 Ch. 559, because an article may be in the chest one day and out of it the next, or may be put there for safe keeping during the testator's last illness by somebody who is taking care of things which are found lying about. Moreover, this form of gift, if it speaks from the death of the testator, would enable him to increase or diminish his gift at pleasure by putting things into the chest or taking them out from time to time, thus accomplishing what cannot be done by referring in the will to a separate paper thereafter to be prepared and signed by the testator. Thayer v. Wellington, 9 Allen, 283, 85 Am. Dec. 753. However, this aspect of the case need not be dwelt on, because the words of the gift are not sufficient to carry the land, even though it was clearly proved that the deed was in the chest all the time. The reason of this is that the deed is not to be considered as property in itself, but evidence of title to property situated elsewhere. Land cannot be deemed to be included among the contents of a chest, merely because a deed conveying it, or an undelivered deed describing it, is contained therein. Many cases are to be found in the books where questions have arisen whether gifts of goods, or chattels, or property, or things contained in or the contents of a certain place, or house, or closet, or cabinet, or desk, or trunk, should be held to include money, bonds, promissory notes, banker's receipts, or other similar articles of personal property, and the decisions have not been uniform. See cases cited in 1 Jarman on Wills, 6th Am. ed. by Bigelow, 709 et seq.; 2 Wms. Exrs. p. 1080 et seq.; Theobald, Wills, 8d ed. 145; Penniman v. French, 17 Pick. 404, 28 Am. Dec. 309; Lock v. Noyes, 9 N. H. 430. But no case has been cited by counsel, or found by us, in which it has been held that land would pass under such a gift by reason of a deed thereof being found among the contents of the place or receptacle designated. On the other hand, title deeds have been selected as the most striking illustration of what would not pass under such general words. Brooke v. Turner, 7 Sim. 671; Robson v. Hamilton [1891], 2 Ch. 559, 565, 566. And a mortgage has been expressly held not to be so included, in Fleming v. Brook, 1 Sch. & Lef. 818, and Brooke v. Turner, supra. It is not as if the testator, in his will, had made a gift of the deed in express terms, or had directed it to be delivered to the tenant. That would have presented a different question. It is, of course, possible that the testator may have mistakenly supposed that his undelivered deed to the tenant would be effectual to convey the land after his own death. If that was so, it might be a reason why he did not give the land to the tenant by his will; but it would not change the construction of the will itself, and enlarge the meaning of the words used, so as to make the land pass under the gift of the chest and its contents.

Judgment for demandants affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania, for Use of Philadelphia County et al., Appl.,
v.

George SCHOLLENBERGER.

1. That one having goods for sale is a nonresident manufacturer and sells his goods within the state through an agent does not, under the Federal Constitution, relieve him from the operation of the local police laws, if he keeps in the state a store containing a stock of goods for the inspection of customers from which he makes sales to actual customers.
2. An original package, trade in which is protected by the Federal Constitution, is such form and size of package as is used by producers or shippers for the purpose of securing both convenience in handling and security in transportation of merchandise between dealers in the ordinary course of actual commerce.
3. Showing that a package of material to be used as food was made, stamped, and branded in another state is not sufficient to show that it is an original package, trade in which is protected by the Federal Constitution, without showing further that it was in the form usually adopted in the trade for purposes of transportation.
4. The sale of a package of goods, entire and unbroken as imported from another state will be protected as interstate commerce only when the form and size of the package is that usually adopted in the trade for purpose of transportation, and not when adopted with a view to unlawful intrastate retail trade.

(July 19, 1893.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas No. 3 for Philadelphia County reversing a judgment of a magistrate's court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the statutory penalty for an alleged violation of the oleomargarine Act. Reversed.

The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, which was as follows:

That the defendant is a resident and citizen of the state of Pennsylvania.

That the defendant is engaged in business at 219 Callowhill street, in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., as the agent of the Oakdale Manufacturing Company, whose principal office and place of business is in the city of Providence and state of Rhode Island; and was acting as such agent from the first day of June, 1891, and on the 30th day of November, 1891.

That the said defendant, on the 21st day of July, 1891, paid to the collector of internal revenue of the first district of Pennsylvania the

NOTE.—The above decision is a very notable one, making a new distinction or test as to original packages of commerce which is of very great importance. That the test adopted based on commercial usage is much less certain in its application than the test of the mere existence of an unbroken package as imported, does not imply that it is or is not the true one although certainty is much to be desired. But another consideration which may perhaps be regarded as more controlling is the question whether or not the shipper and importer of goods from one state into another to be sold in original packages in defiance of state law can be restricted by any custom of the trade as to the form and size of packages which shall be protected. Since the sale in any form or size of package is condemned by the state law and the parties to the business must intend to do what the state law forbids, it may be questioned whether they have not the right if they are entitled to sell their goods in defiance of state law at all, to put the goods up in the form which will most facilitate their sales; or to put it in another form whether a package which can be readily sold directly to the consumer may not be an article of interstate commerce when transported from another state and sold unbroken. Whatever may be the final decision on this point by the Supreme Court of the United States, the Pennsylvania court has enlarged the law of interstate commerce in a very important particular.

As to what constitutes original packages, see also State v. Chapman (S. Dak.) 10 L. R. A. 432, and Keith v. State (Ala.) 10 L. R. A. 430.

sum of four hundred and eighty dollars, as and for a special tax upon the business as agent for the Oakdale Manufacturing Company in oleomargarine, and obtained from said collector a writing in the words following: "Internal revenue store license to defendant as agent."

That on November 30, 1891, in the city of Philadelphia, at his said place of business as aforesaid, said defendant, acting as agent for the said Oakdale Manufacturing Company, sold and delivered to one John H. Berry, carrying on the business of a coffee house, at 606 Lombard street, in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., a package containing eighty pounds of oleomargarine for the sum of $12.40, which said sum of $12.40 was paid to the defendant as agent of the Oakdale Manufacturing Company on the said 30th day of November, 1891; which said package of oleomargarine was manufactured in the state of Rhode Island and shipped to their agent, the defendant, the said George Schollenberger, who sold and delivered the said package, unbroken, to the said John H. Berry, and which package was marked, branded, and stamped in the manner prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue with the approval of the secretary of the treasury.

If, upon this statement of facts, the court is of the opinion that the defendant is liable for the penalty imposed by the act of assembly, entitled, "An Act for the Protection of the Public Health and to Prevent the Adulteration of Dairy Products and Fraud in the Sale thereof," approved May 21, 1885, then judgment to be entered in favor of the commonwealth and against the defendant in the sum of $100 and costs of this suit; but if the court be of the opinion that for any reason the defendant is not so liable, then judgment be entered for the defendant.

It is hereby agreed by counsel for plaintiff and defendant in the above case, that for the purpose of this case, the word "oleomargarine," when used in the case stated, is intended to mean "an article designed to take the place of butter or cheese produced from pure and unadulterated milk, or cream from the same; and manufactured out of any oleaginous substance or any compound of the same, other than that produced from unadulterated milk or cream from the same."

It is further agreed that the said package was sold as an article of food within the words of the Act of May 21, 1885.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case belongs to an rapidly growing class, that has already become uncomfortably large and troublesome in this state. The profits to be derived from an unlawful traffic are much larger than those that flow from legitimate trade, provided the unlawful traffic may be pursued without serious interference from the officers of the law. Law-abiding citizens will not embark in a business that is forbidden by the laws of the state in which they live. Timid men are afraid to do so. This kind of operation is left therefore to those who have no respect for law, no interest in the public welfare, and no fear of public opinion. When such men deliberately determine to put money in their pockets by engaging in a business which the state has declared to be injurious to the public morals, the public health, or the public peace, and has therefore forbidden altogether, or placed under strict police regulations, they are morally certain to seek immunity for themselves and their unlawful business by immediate flight to the sanctuary of the national constitution, and there laying hold on the horns of the altar of interstate commerce. The road to this refuge of lawbreakers is well beaten. There are signboards at every crossing on the route, and the intermediate stations for possible rest wear conspicuous signs of invitation. The travelers over it are generally foreigners to the state whose laws they trample upon, and include a motley assortment of traders. Beginning with the peripatetic swindlers whose worthless wares are transported in tin trunks, which they carry in their hands, and who hunt their victims in the secluded villages and along the country roads, with an instinct that rarely fails, and running up or down the scale of lawbreakers to the men whose commercial operations extend to the sale of oleomargarine by the pound, and of intoxicating drinks by the pint, there is no man in the procession who is not a conscious and deliberate law-breaker, and who does not set his possible profits from a forbidden business above his duty to society or the state that protects him. These men seek to pervert a rule of law that has a wide and a beneficial field of operation. They claim to be engaged in interstate commerce, and to be entitled to the protection of the general government, as against the police laws of the individual states, for that reason. In support of their claim they will assert that their "goods," whether consisting of oleomargarine, beer, whiskey, paste diamonds, pinchbeck watches, or the like, were made on the other side of the state line, and imported by or for them; or it may be they will claim to be the agents or factors of the makers, or to have received, and to be engaged in selling, "original packages" consisting of a pound of oleomargarine, or a pocket flask of whisky, put up expressly for their trade at the still or factory, just "over the line." The mischief done and attempted in this manner, under the guise of interstate commerce, is so great, so open, and so difficult to suppress or punish that in many states besides this it has become a matter of general and sincere regret that the interstate commerce clause was ever held applicable to trade in any article recognized throughout the civilized world as a proper subject for police regulation and control. We are embarrassed by the difficulties in the way of the enforcement of our police legislation made in good faith, for the protection of our citizens. The question involved in this case is therefore one of great practical importance. It is nothing less than whether the police power of the states survives at all, or has been absorbed and extinguished by the interstate commerce clause in the national constitution. We recognize the fact that this is a federal question. It has been the subject of many decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States, and was at one time thought to be well settled in favor of the existence and proper exercise of police powers by the several states. We entertain that opinion still, but the contrary view has been pressed upon us with so much earnestness in the argument that we feel constrained to examine briefly some of the positions taken by the appellant.

It is said the recent case of Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, justifies the contention that this state is powerless to interfere with the defendant's traffic. But Leisy v. Hardin, like all other cases, must be read in the light of its own facts. Leisy was a brewer, who made beer in the state of Illinois. Hardin was an officer of the state of Iowa, where the law forbade the sale, and the keeping for sale, of any form of intoxicating drink except for sacramental, medical, or mechanical purposes. Leisy shipped from his brewers in Illinois to his agent in Iowa about 300 casks and eleven cases of beer, sealed in the ordinary manner. These were sent there for sale, and were in the hands of Leisy's agent or employer in Iowa for that purpose. While the entire consignment of beer was yet in the possession of the maker or his agent, with seals unbroken, it was seized by Hardin, under the law of Iowa, and taken out of the possession of Leisy's agent. An action of replevin was then brought to recover the casks and cases so taken. Two questions were thus raised. First, Did Leisy own the packages taken from the possession of his agent? Second, If he was the owner, has he a right to have them in his possession in the state of Iowa? The first question was not controverted. He was the maker and owner of the packages seized. The second question was one of law, and was disposed of upon the interstate commerce clause. The goods being in original packages, with seals unbroken, no sales having been made therefrom, it was held that they were not liable to seizure under the police laws of the state into which they had been brought. This is the single question involved in that case, and beyond that it is not binding as a precedent upon the court that rendered the judgment, nor upon us. We shall not question the wisdom of that decision, nor abate one jot from its legal force, though we sincerely regret some of its consequences. Standing, therefore, squarely on the case of Leisy v. Hardin, let us proceed to an examination of the question presented on this record.

The defendant, Schollenberger, is a citizen and resident of this state. For at least two years he has been living under the protection of its laws, and is bound by all the obligations that such residence and protection impose. He is a merchant, with a store in the city of Philadelphia. He sells his goods to customers as other merchants sell their goods, from his stock in store open to their examination. The commodity, or one of the commodities, in which he deals is oleomargarine, for the sale of which at his store in Philadelphia he has obtained a license under the internal revenue laws of the United States during the last two years. He sells, not for shipment in original packages to other countries or other states, but to local customers, and in the case now before us, to an eating-house keeper near by, for consumption upon his table as an article of food. Now, our statute explicitly forbids the sale and keeping and the offering of oleomargarine for sale as an article of food. The identical acts forbidden by the law are thus seen to be the acts which he admits he is engaged in, and which he claims the right to do, notwithstanding his residence in, and the statutes of, the state. This right he claims to derive from the interstate commerce clause in two ways. The first of these rests on the nonresidence of the manufacturer. He asserts that the oleomargarine is made in another state. Because the manufacturer can lawfully make and sell under the laws of the state where the manufactory is located, he contends that the manufacturer can sell his own product anywhere, and for this purpose can establish stores for its sale all over this state, if he chooses to do so. As the manufacturer may do this in person, it is contended that he can do it by an agent, so that he could have as many stores, conducted by as many agents as there are towns in the commonwealth, and conduct the trade in them all, regardless of the police laws of the state. The second line along which he claims to derive immunity is the "original package" doctrine. He says he sells in the packages made up at the factory. He does not divide a roll, a pail, or tub of his "goods," but requires the purchaser to take the entire roll, pail, or tub made, filled, or shaped at the factory. We think neither of these positions should avail the defendant. We do not deny that a nonresident manufacturer may sell his goods, and ship them to a buyer in the usual trade packages employed in good faith by manufacturers, without being amenable to the police laws of this state therefor. He may bring them here, and hold them in bulk without danger. So much is fairly ruled in Leisy v. Hardin. He may sell them to the trade or for shipment to the states in the same unbroken trade packages, notwithstanding their unlawful character. This clearly results from the rule in Leisy v. Hardin. We might have held, had the question been one for us, that the object of the interstate law commerce clause was quite different from what it seems thought to be. We might have thought it intended to prevent the establishment of state custom-houses and taxation along state lines, and to make for the general purposes of legitimate trade all the states open to the manufacturers and merchants of the several states. But for this the states might have intercepted all goods reaching their borders, and weighed, valued, and taxed them before permitting them to proceed to their destination. The destructive effect upon commerce of such restrictions was clearly foreseen and wisely guarded against by our fathers. But the protection of the lives, the health, and morals of citizens was the chief of the duties of government left to the states when the Union was formed. The common-law rights and remedies are to be sought in the courts of the states. For this reason we would have held that the police regulations of the states stood on impregnable ground, and that, while no state had the right to tax or to burden interstate commerce, each state had the right to exclude from its territory such articles of food or drink as were injurious in their character and effect upon the health or the morals of the public. But, however this may be, it will not be denied that state commerce—that is, business conducted within the lines of a state—was left to state control. It was the intention of the United States to protect the citizens and the productions of one state against unjust discrimination by the other states, but it was and is the duty of the state to protect its citizens against each other.

If, then, the retail of oleomargarine at the defendant's store is to be regarded as in any sense his business, as it would seem to be from the form of the licenses attached to the case stated, and from all the facts, he is clearly liable as an individual to the penalty provided by the law which he has broken. Can the facts that the store is the store of the manufacturer, and that he is their agent, relieve him from liability? The sales are not made from the factory, nor under the right which the fact of making confers on the maker. On the contrary, the sales are made under a store license granted, not to an establishment located in another state, but to a store in this state. When a nonresident of Pennsylvania comes into the state to embark in business here, his situation is like that of any other resident, and his business done at his store is state, not interstate. It does not matter where he obtains his goods. Interstate commerce does not necessarily depend on the origin of goods; or, rather, all men who buy and sell foreign merchandise are not necessarily engaged in interstate commerce. If it was otherwise, all merchants would be superior to state laws, for all deal to some extent in goods made in other states and in other countries. It is not simply or mainly the origin of the goods, therefore, that is to be considered, but the nature of the business done. One who keeps a stock of goods in store for the inspection of customers, and sells from this stock to actual consumers, is a local dealer. His business is intrastate, not interstate. Our Act of 1885, under which this case arises, is not a trade regulation. It is a police law. This court has so held repeatedly, and our view of it was expressly affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, a case which turned upon that single question. It does not undertake to deal with an importer from another country or state, but with manufacturers, and dealers within the state. It prohibits the manufacture of oleomargarine within the limits of the state. It also prohibits the sale, the offer to sell, and the having in possession with intent to sell, the same "as an article of food." It lays its prohibition on those who are fairly subject to its jurisdiction, and on no others. We have, then, a valid police law, so declared by the highest tribunal in the land, which prohibits the sale of oleomargarine as an article of food within the state. We have the proprietor of a store located and licensed here making sales of the prohibited article to customers for the prohibited purpose. It does not matter that the merchant makes his home in another state, or that he makes his sales by a clerk or agent, rather than in person. He is a local dealer, selling in violation of the local law, and liable to its penalty. If the residence of the dealer could affect the character of his trade, then our police laws, intended to protect our own people, would operate as a discrimination against our citizens, and in favor of citizens of other states, and would commit to those having no interests in common with us a most odious monopoly in every form or kind of traffic which our state should attempt to regulate or to suppress. Trenched behind the interstate commerce clause so construed, citizens of other states could prey upon our people, trample upon our laws, and make gain out of a traffic forbidden to our citizens, only to be delivered up absolutely and unconditionally to them. It would require only that such citizen of another state should establish a local store in some of our towns or cities, or in all of them; conduct a local business, to meet a local demand; and, when called upon by the officers of the law, make reply that he made the goods in some other state, and, as a manufacturer, supplied himself, as a local dealer, with wares of a foreign origin. Neither the foreign origin of the goods sold, nor of the seller, nor both together, will convert a business that is local and intrastate into one that is general and interstate, within the meaning of the constitution of the United States.

But the defendant's second position is that, admitting the views now stated to be correct, he is, nevertheless, beyond the reach of the state law for another reason, viz. that his sales are made in original packages, and are therefore interstate commerce. We have examined the decisions of the supreme court of the United States for a definition of the term "original package." It does not seem, however, to have received, and perhaps at this time is not capable of, a precise definition, that may be applied to it in all cases. The idea for which it stands is, however, not difficult of apprehension or statement. The methods adopted by manufacturers and importers for packing and preparing goods for transportation by sea or land differ with the differences in the character, bulk, and material of the merchandise itself. The general purpose is to adopt that form and size of package best adapted to the safe and convenient transportation and delivery of the particular class of goods to be moved, because the convenience of the trade will be best subserved thereby. Such packages, put up with a view to the convenience and security of transportation and handling, in the regular course of trade, are the original packages of commerce. If we look at the meaning of the words "employed" we are brought to the same conclusion. "Original" means pertaining to the beginning or origin; the first or primitive form of a thing. "Package" means a bundle or parcel made up of several smaller parcels, combined or bound together in one bale, box, crate, or other form of package. An "original package" is such form and size of package as is used by producers or shippers for the purpose of securing both convenience in handling and security in transportation of merchandise between dealers in the ordinary course of actual commerce. Such packages are not always made up by putting smaller packages or bundles together, but may include any form of receptacle that shall hold a fixed quantity; as a barrel of sugar or salt, a bag of coffee, a chest of tea, and the like. The package must not be divided or its unity destroyed. When it is received unbroken from the importer through the custom house, or from the manufacturer by the ordinary channels of transportation, it is within the protection of the interstate commerce doctrine, and the state may not subject it to vexatious delays, appraisalment, taxation, or trade restriction. But it has never been held that the importer might subdivide his package, and dispose of its several parts in detail. On the contrary, in many cases the United States courts have held that, upon such subdivision or breaking of bulk, the original package ceased to be such; and the goods became mixed with, and indistinguishable from, the merchandise already within the state, and therefore subject to state laws. This assigns to each jurisdiction its proper powers. The general government protects the citizens of the several states in the movement of their commodities across state lines for the purpose of commerce. The state regulates the retail trade conducted within its own borders, and forbids the sale of such articles to its citizens as it finds to be injurious to them. We are asked in this case to go a step further, and hold that any package which a manufacturer may choose to put up and send to himself as a merchant, or to a customer, is necessarily an "original package," because it was put up by a manufacturer outside of the state. We cannot so hold.

This question was brought to our attention recently by the case of Com. v. Zelt, 188 Pa. 615, 11 L. R. A. 602. In that case a distiller living, or at least making whiskey, just over the state line, established a store or an agency within the state. He put up his "goods" in bottles, ranging in capacity from one quart down to one-half pint, and, packing them in unsealed barrels, sent them to the Pennsylvania store. When they reached the agent, the bottles were taken from the barrels, and arranged upon the shelves and in the windows of the store in the manner usual in that trade, and sold to customers. The seller was prosecuted for the sale of intoxicating liquors without a license, such as the laws of the state require. His defense was—the now common one—that he was engaged in interstate commerce. His position was that the bottles sold by him singly to customers had been filled and corked at the distillery, which was in another state, and that they were the "original packages" put up by the maker, and transported across the line to his store for sale. The contention was seriously and earnestly made that any size or shape of jug or bottle which the distiller might desire to meet the needs of the retail sale of drink became, when filled and shipped by him across a state line, an "original package," within the meaning of that phrase as used by the United States courts in the interstate commerce cases. The character of the package appears to have been submitted to the jury, who convicted the defendant. The defendant appealed to this court, and we said, through Paxson, Ch. J.: "Whether a box or a barrel of beer can be separated and sold in single bottles as original packages will be formally decided when the question squarely arises. The jury evidently regarded it as a trick and an evasion of our statute." The judgment was accordingly affirmed. The question which it was not necessary to decide in Com. v. Zelt, supra, is fairly involved in this case, so far as oleomargarine is concerned. The case stated concedes that the package was sold by this defendant for consumption, as "an article of food," but asserts that it was sold in the form in which the maker put it up at his factory. It is not said that it was an "original package" in express words, nor that it was in the form usually adopted in the trade for purposes of transportation. It is reasonable to infer that when the defendant was admitting the sale, and setting up his justification for a violation of the law, he would do this as strongly as the facts would sustain him, had he gone into the proof upon a trial before a jury. What the case stated does tell us is that the defendant sold at his store in Philadelphia, to one John H. Berry, the keeper of a coffee house at 606 Lombard street, Philadelphia, a package of oleomargarine, weighing eighty pounds, made and stamped and branded in Rhode Island, for use as an article of food. This is almost identical with the defense in Com. v. Zelt, which was that the bottles sold by the defendant were put up and shipped in another state, and sold in the same form in which they were received. This does not go far enough. The defendant in this case, as in Zelt's Case, was prima facie a lawbreaker. It was incumbent on him to show his right to violate the police laws of the state in which he lived or carried on his store affirmatively and clearly. It is not enough to hint or suggest the existence of such a right. It must be set up, and his ability to escape the penalty of the broken law depends on the sufficiency of the justification. The fact alleged as a justification is that the package sold was "made, stamped, and branded" in Rhode Island. To enable the defendant to stand on this statement, it is necessary for us to go with him to his legal conclusion, viz., whatever package is put up at a factory outside the state is an "original package," within the meaning of the interstate commerce doctrine. This we distinctly refuse to do. The United States courts have not so held as we understand the cases, and such a conclusion could not be sustained on principle, as the question presents itself to us. The consequences of such a holding are obvious. In this case the owners of the store in Philadelphia are the owners of the factory in another state. As merchants they understand the needs of their retail trade, and the forms and sizes of rolls, tubs, or packages that will best suit the wants of their customers. As manufacturers they can put their product in packages of such size and shape as shall meet their own needs as merchants. They have both ends of the traffic in their hands, and may do, as they undoubtedly are in the habit of doing, whatever their profits as retailers require them to do as manufacturers. A jury would be justified in finding in such a case, as the jury found in Zett's Case, that the mode of putting up the packages was not adapted to meet the requirements of actual interstate commerce, but the requirements of an unlawful, intrastate, retail trade. In this case the facts are found for us as by the parties. We are to determine their legal effect. The defendant is found to have made sales of oleo-margarine as an article of food contrary to the provisions of our statute. It is also found that he made these sales for a nonresident employer. But the residence or business of the owner, standing alone, is wholly immaterial. Our law deals with the local trade, regardless of the nationality or residence of the trader. It is further found that the sales are made in packages put up by the trader at his factory, and sent to his store in this city for sale. This, as we have said, does not amount to an assertion that the sales are made in the "original packages" of commerce. If it shows anything upon the subject, it shows that they are not so made. One who plants his feet squarely upon the police laws of this state, and defies its officers to suppress or to punish his unlawful trade, must show a clear legal right to take and maintain his position as a public enemy, or suffer the penalty of the broken law. To hold otherwise would make it impossible for the people of any state to protect themselves from evils that by common consent throughout the civilized world need to be restrained and removed by suitable legislation. It would also strike a blow of absolutely crushing weight at the existence of the police power in the several states, and render all attempts at its exercise ineffectual and useless.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and judgment is now entered on the case stated in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $100, with the costs of suit. After judgment is properly entered, let the record be remitted for purposes of execution.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

H. A. SCHLICHTER et al.

v.

M. F. KEITER et al., Appts.

(156 Pa. 119.)

1. The burden is on those who seek to dispossess of church property trustees who with their predecessors have been in continuous possession of it for more than sixty years to show affirmatively how and when their title accrued and that it is good and valid.
2. Acquiescence in and use of a constitution by a church society for more than fifty years settles the question of its validity.
3. For the purpose of settling the title to church property courts may inquire into and determine the validity of an attempt to amend the constitution and confession of faith of the society so as to ascertain whether those adhering to the original or amended documents constitute the society.
4. The finding of a referee affirmed by the trial court is conclusive as to whether or not an attempted amendment of the confession of faith of a religious society was so radical as to destroy the identity of the church, unless clear error in the finding is pointed out.
5. A provision of a church constitution that no rule shall be passed "to change or do away with the confession of faith as it now stands" does not prevent changes in the interest of clearness of expression or fullness of statement of the accepted doctrines of the church.
6. An affirmative vote of more than two thirds of those voting in response to a proposition of the governing body of a church to change the constitution is effective under a constitution authorizing changes "on the request of two thirds of the whole society" although the whole number of votes cast is only a little over one third of the church membership.

7. The adherents to the new constitution and not the dissenters therefrom constitute the church, where the governing body makes a proposition for a permissible change to the old constitution and confession of faith which after ample time for consideration and a suitable system for ascertaining preferences is adopted by the required majority of those voting and the change is then promulgated by the bishops under the direction of the governing body.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Franklin County in favor of complainants in a suit brought by the officers of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, at Greencastle, to enjoin defendants from interfering with them in the exercise of their respective offices, and also to enjoin them from interfering with the church property. Affirmed.

The opinion of the court below was as follows:

"The subject of this controversy is the house of worship owned by the congregation of the United Brethren in Christ at Greencastle, in this county. The building was erected by the congregation, out of voluntary subscriptions, upon a lot of ground acquired by the same means, and which was conveyed by deed bearing date 22d March, 1828, to one John Dome, who thereupon by deed, in which it is recited that the lot was purchased for the purpose of erecting a church for the United Brethren in Christ, conveyed it 'to George Zeigler, Jacob Wingerd, Samuel Lenhard, and Solomon Moor, trustees of said congregation, for the only use and interest above described, and for no other purpose.' The parties to the contention, upon the one side and the other, are the office bearers and trustees of what, unfortunately, are now two distinct and separate congregations, each claiming, as against the other, the right to the exclusive use of the church property, as being the only true congregation of the United Brethren in Christ at Greencastle. Both alike make their appeal to the civil power; each insisting that the other is an intruder, and asking that it be restrained from further interference with the other's rights.

"The case as disclosed by the respective bills, answers, and proofs, is substantially as follows: The denomination of the United Brethren in Christ has existed as an unincorporated religious association since about 1800. From a small beginning, which seemed without much promise of expansion or permanence, it has grown into an organization which numbers its adherents by hundreds of thousands, and which now takes rank with the prominent and leading representatives of Protestant Christian thought and work. It has its institutions of learning, its boards of charities, missions, and publication, and other organized departments of religious activity. It has an established polity and church government, peculiarly its own, which have grown and developed with the increase of the society in numbers and importance. Under this general system, the individual churches belonging to the denomination are subordinate members, owing and yielding allegiance and submission to the authority of the whole church, as represented by its general conference, where resides the ultimate power. They are also subordinate to certain established intermediate tribunals, whose authority acts more directly upon them. The scheme of government contemplates, first of all, the individual church, or congregation; next, the circuit, which embraces several churches associated under the general supervision of one minister, designated 'preacher in charge'; next, the quarterly conference, composed of the presiding elder, the preachers of the several churches in the circuit, and certain officers of each church; next, the annual conference, with such territorial limits as are defined by an authority still superior, and which is composed of the presiding elders and preachers within the bounds of the conference, and a lay representative of one from each church; and, finally, the general conference, which is made up of the bishops of the church and delegates elected from each annual conference. It is unnecessary to inquire into the limitations of power of these subordinate departments, nor is it important to inquire into the growth and development of the system of government. The general conference, as an ultimate court, has had an existence since 1815. In this year it formulated and promulgated a system of doctrine and belief, and rules of discipline, which, by reason of its imprimatur, became the law of faith and practice throughout the entire church. In 1841, at a regular meeting of the conference, and in the exercise of an authority which, if questioned at the time, has been fully acquiesced in ever since, it ordained the only constitution the church ever had until the present contention began. Its final authority in all such matters has been recognized and approved during all the years of the church's existence since its first meeting in 1815. With the rapid growth of the society came diversity of views, and the harmony which had contributed so much to the prosperity of the church was disturbed by urgent demands on the one side for a change in the articles of faith and constitution, and by conservative resistance on the other. The conference of 1885 was in sympathy with those who demanded revision; and it ordained a commission of twenty-seven, composed of the bishops of the church, and ministers and laymen designated by itself, with powers thus defined: 'To consider our present confession of faith and constitution, and prepare such a form of belief and such amended fundamental rules for the government of this church in the future as will, in their judgment, be best adapted to secure its growth and efficiency in the work of evangelizing the world.' The action of the conference contemplated a submission of the work of the commission to a vote of the society or church, and the commission was directed to devise regulations for its publication and submission. A revised confession and constitution were agreed upon by the commission; and by a vote of the church, taken in accordance with the method presented by the commission, they were approved by a large majority—more than two thirds—of those voting thereon. At the next regular session of the conference, held at York, Pennsylvania, in 1880, the commission reported the confession and constitution as revised by it, and made return of the vote which had been taken thereon. Whereupon, by a vote of 110 to 20, the report was adopted by the conference, and a majority of the bishops united in a proclamation to the churches, wherein the result was announced, and it was declared that the document which had been voted upon 'is the confession of faith and constitution of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and we do pass from under the old, and legislate under the new, constitution.' Of the minority who opposed this action, about fifteen, including one of the regular bishops of the church, withdrew from the meeting, and, assembling elsewhere, organized themselves into a conference, and sat in regular sessions, claiming to be the regular general conference of the church. They repudiated the action of the body from which they had withdrawn, as violative of the fundamental law of the society, and revolutionary, and proceeded with the business of the conference they had organized regardless of the other body. Thus occurred the separation which has been so fruitful of strife and litigation throughout the whole church, and which has so divided the allegiance of the membership of the church at Greencastle as to occasion this present contention. With two general conferences, each claiming to represent the church at large, and each having its own proper subordinate annual conferences and circuits, and all the external organs of separate legitimate existence, we have, in point of fact, two distinct organized societies. One or other is the Church of the United Brethren in Christ by right and historical succession, but both cannot be. Which is it? This, in brief, is the question here raised. The house of worship at Greencastle, for the possession of which both parties are here contending, is the property of the congregation of the United Brethren in Christ at Greencastle, and those persons constitute the congregation who are in connection and correspondence with that body which is the true general conference of the church. It is with the rights of property that we are dealing, and these rights can be determined only by the relations which the contending parties sustain to the church of the United Brethren in Christ.

"Several considerations agree in giving to the plaintiffs the advantage of a prima facie case. There is the fact of uninterrupted succession in, and controlling action of, the conference to which they are adherents. That the body which met at York was the general conference of the church is not questioned. There is no complaint that it was irregularly or improperly constituted. Of the one hundred and thirty members who composed it, at least one hundred and ten continued to the end, participating in its work, and maintaining their allegiance to its organization. The general machinery of church organization has remained under its control, as has the management of the charities and temporalities of the church. It has continued to command the allegiance and support of a large majority of the bishops, ministers, and laity of the church, and by far the greater number of the local churches continue their connection with it, accepting the new confession of faith, and submitting to the government of the revised constitution. The majority of the members of the Greencastle congregation support it. The act of withdrawal from this general conference was the act of those who composed the conference to which the defendants adhere. Under this state of facts, we may start with the presumption of regularity in that division of the church here represented by the plaintiffs, and which, for purposes of convenience, we shall designate as the 'Liberals,' since, if that is not their adopted name, it is the one by which they have come to be generally known; and call upon the defendants, who represent the division known in the same way as the 'Radicals,' to make good their claim to legitimacy. This, by their answer and cross-bill, and the evidence offered, they claim to have done, and it is for us now to inquire how far they have succeeded.

"The immediate cause of separation was the adoption of the new constitution and the new or revised confession of faith by the general conference of 1890. The radicals reject both, maintaining their organized existence under the constitution of 1841, and observing the confession of 1815 as their only rule of faith. Their contention is, first of all, that the inheritance and succession is in them, because they are identical in faith and practice with the original historic Church of the United Brethren in Christ; that, although a minority, they are the only existing organization that recognizes the constitution which has been the law of the church since 1841, and accepts the confession of faith which the church adopted and proclaimed in 1815,—a position which, however important as part of the defendants' case, would not, of itself, be conclusive of the controversy, no matter how well sustained, as will appear subsequent; and, secondly, that the liberals, through the conference to which they adhere, have, by a proceeding irregular and revolutionary, adopted a new and different constitution from that which was and is the law of the church, and have adopted and proclaimed a new and different standard of faith from that which the church had always observed, and that by so doing they have formed a new and different religious society, and so forfeited all claims to recognition as the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. The first position, as I have stated it, may be conceded. The radicals do adhere to the old confession, and do observe as the law of their organization the old constitution, both in all their literalness; and they are the only society of which this can be said. The inconclusiveness of this, however, will appear further on. It is the second proposition which challenges and invites investigation. It suggests two distinct inquiries: First, as to the change in the constitution; and, second, with respect to the change in the confession of faith. We shall observe this order in their consideration.

"Two general objections are made to the action of the general conference with reference to the constitution: First, that the change was not made in accordance with the laws and usages of the church; and, second, that certain provisions of the old constitution, which were therein declared to be inviolable, have been so altered and amended as to work a virtual repeal of the original provisions. In the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to discuss, or even indicate, the points of difference between the old and new constitution. It is enough to say that they do not in any serious manner affect the internal order and government of the society. The gravamen of the first objection lies in the alleged disregard of the 4th section of article 2 of the old constitution, which provides that 'there shall be no alteration of the foregoing constitution, unless by request of two thirds of the whole society.' It is undoubtedly true that both the idea of revision, and the scheme for its accomplishment, originated with the general conference of 1885, held at Fostoria, Ohio. It had no request of any kind before it, looking to this end. That conference created the commission, of its own motion, 'to consider our present confession of faith and constitution, and prepare such a form of belief, and such amended fundamental rules for the government of the church in the future, as will, in their judgment, be best adapted to secure its growth and efficiency in the work of evangelizing the world.' It authorized and empowered this commission to devise a plan for the submission of their work to a vote of the society, without first reporting it to the conference. In November following, the commission met, prepared a new confession and constitution, and adopted a plan for their submission to popular vote, to be taken during the month of November, 1888. At this election, held in November, 1888, throughout the churches, the smallest vote that was cast for any part of the revised work—it having been submitted in several separate sections—was 46,994, while the largest vote cast against any part was 7,298. The vote in favor was thus largely in excess of two thirds of the entire vote cast, though not reaching to even a majority of the whole society; the evidence showing a total membership somewhat exceeding 200,000. At the next quadrennial conference, in 1889, the commission reported its work, and the result of the vote taken thereon; and by a vote of 110 to 20 the report was approved and adopted, and proclamation was made of the result by the board of bishops. So we have, then, two particulars in which it is alleged there was serious and fatal disregard of constitutional provisions, viz., the adoption by the conference of a new or amended constitution without a previous request, and its adoption upon less than a two-thirds vote of the entire society. We shall not consider the charges of mala fides which are made by the defendants in this connection, with respect to the method of submission, for even the unfairness which they impute, if established as a fact, would not constitute fraud; and, in considering the two particulars above stated, we shall take no account of those minor and subordinate complaints which relate to the time of the submission, insufficiency of notice, etc., since all these will find their appropriate answers in the conclusions we reach on the main propositions.

"With reference to these organic changes, it should be understood that they are to be inquired into only for the purpose of ascertaining whether there has been any loss or change of identity in the organization. The law has no supervisory power over these societies, which would enable it to correct mistakes, if any are made. So long as they do not violate the settled rules of property and morality, they can preach and practice and govern as they please, without let or hindrance from the civil power. But when a change of organic law results in a division of the society, and two rival bodies contend at law for the control, the methods by which the change was effected become a proper subject of inquiry, since, if these methods were inconsistent with, and opposed to, the fundamental law,—in other words, revolutionary,—it would be clear usurpation in those acting under them to exercise control, as against even a minority adhering to the original compact. In such case the minority, if organized, would be the true, legitimate body, both in fact and law. It is in this aspect that the question is both proper and material. Says Chief Justice Gibson in Com. v. Green, 4 Whart. 598, in speaking of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church and the relation it bears to its trustees, who are formed by the law into a distinct corporation: 'It is a segregated association, which, although it is the reproductive organ of corporate succession, is not itself a member of the body, and in that respect it is anomalous. Having no corporate quality in itself, it is not a subject of our corrective jurisdiction, or of our scrutiny, further than to ascertain how far its organic structure may bear on the question of its personal identity or individuality. By the charter of the corporation, of which this is the handmaid and nurse, it has a limited capacity to create vacancies in it, and an unlimited power over the form and manner of choice in filling them. It would be sufficient for the civil tribunals, therefore, that the assembled commissioners had constituted an actual body, and that it had made its appointment in its own way, without regard to its fairness in respect to its numbers, with this limitation, however: that it had the assent of the constitutional majority, of which the official act of authentication would be at least prima facie evidence. . . . Hence, where, as in this instance, the members have formed themselves into separate bodies, numerically sufficient for corporate capacity and organic action, it becomes necessary to ascertain how far either of them was formed in obedience to the conventional law of the association, which, for that purpose only, is to be treated as a rule of civil obligation.'

"Were the changes here complained of made in conformity with, or in violation of, the fundamental law? This makes a consideration of the constitution of 1841 necessary. Under that instrument the general conference is invested with great amplitude of power, yet manifestly less than it had before, since the constitution itself was originally of its own making. The preamble recites that the purpose of the constitution is, among other things, to define the power and business of quarterly, annual, and general conferences. By section 1 of article 1, 'all ecclesiastical power herein granted, to make or repeal any rule of discipline, is vested in a general conference, which shall consist of elders elected by the members in every conference district throughout the society.' By article 2, power is given it to define the business of the annual conferences, to elect the bishops, and to try, by impeachment, annual conferences. The only restrictions or limitations upon the general grant of power are to be found in sections 4-7. These are, in substance, that 'no rule or ordinance shall be passed to change or do away with the confession of faith, as it now stands, nor to destroy the itinerant plan;' 'no rule shall be adopted that will infringe upon the rights of any, as it relates to the mode of baptism, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, or the washing of feet;' 'no rule shall be made that will deprive local preachers of their votes in the annual conference to which they may be attached;' and 'there shall be no connection with secret combinations, nor shall involuntary servitude be tolerated in any way.' That these are intended as restrictions upon the grant of powers to the general conference is obvious. They were directed against the only body in the church that had authority to make and ordain rules, and they can have no significance whatever, except as we apply them to that body. They were not of the nature of a bill of rights, excepting these particular subjects from governmental interference or change; at least, we have no right to assume that they were. Indeed, the contrary becomes manifest, in the light of the fourth article, which, in its single section, provides that there shall be no change 'in the foregoing constitution, unless by request of two thirds of the whole society.' The instrument thus itself provides for their change, for they are part of 'the foregoing constitution;' and furthermore, it commits the power to make the change to the general conference, subject only to the limitation that the two thirds of the whole society shall request it. The chief purpose of the constitution seems to have been to evidence by written fundamental law that the general conference was the supreme tribunal of the church, invested with highest legislative and judicial functions, and restricted only as therein expressed. The powers which it had theretofore exercised without question or dissent were bounded only by extremest limits. The constitution contains but little that does not refer to the conference; and if we read it in the light of ordinary language, the circumstances attending its formation, and the earlier government of the church, as we are bound to do, we must conclude that it commits to the general conference all power except that which it expressly reserves or denies. Not by rule, not by ordinance, not by legislative enactment, could the conference change the confession of faith, or establish connection with secret combinations, or do any of these things expressly denied it; but, upon request of two thirds of the whole society, it could accomplish any or all of these things in the way pointed out,—that is to say, by first changing the constitution. The essential thing, to make the change consistent with the law, was the assent of the two thirds to the removal of the constitutional restriction. The power was given to the conference, with this limitation fastened upon it.

"We cannot consider seriously the argument that would avoid the action of the conference because a formal request had not been submitted to it before it began the work of revision and change. The objection is purely technical, and, so far as we can see, without merit. It sticks in the bark. Says Chief Justice Gibson in Com. v. Clark, 7 Watts & S. 188: 'A constitution is not to receive a technical construction, like a common-law instrument or a statute. It is to be interpreted so as to carry out the great principles of the government, not to defeat them; and to this end its commands as to time or manner of performing an act are to be considered merely directory, whenever it is not said that the act shall be performed at the time or in the manner prescribed, and no other.' If the assent of the requisite number was obtained to the proposed change before the change was actually made, the purpose of the constitutional limitation was fully met. To hold otherwise would be to give to a mere formality, which is without essential purpose, an importance which neither the phraseology nor the spirit of the instrument suggests. Now, was the assent of two thirds of the whole society obtained, as required by the law? The change was made finally by the general conference, the only body, as we have seen, that could make it; but its regularity depends upon the previous assent of the constitutional number. In interpreting this provision, we must have regard to the general scheme of the church's government. In the proper exercise of its power, the conference had raised up the commission, and charged it with the work of preparing a revised constitution, and had empowered it to arrange and provide for an election throughout the church, the vote to be upon the acceptance or rejection of the commission's work. The orders of this commission with reference to this election became the instrumental process through which the authorized expression of the society's will was to be obtained. 'When a law becomes the instrumental process of amendment,' says Chief Justice Agnew in Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 47, 15 Am. Rep. 563, 'it is not because the legislature possesses any inherent power to change the existing constitution through a convention, but because it is the only means through which an authorized consent of the whole people, the entire state, can be lawfully obtained in a state of peace. Irregular action, whereby a certain number of the people assume to act for the whole, is evidently revolutionary. The people, that entire body called the "state," can be bound as a whole body only by an act proceeding from themselves. In a state of peaceful government they have conferred this authority upon a part to speak for the whole only at an election authorized by law. It is only when an election is authorized by law, the electors, who represent the state or whole people, are bound to attend, and if they do not, can be bound by the expression of the will of those who do attend.' This was said of the state, but it is alike applicable to church government. The constitution is silent as to the method of ascertaining the will of the society. It is not unreasonable to suppose that an election was the contemplated method, since it is the usual one in such cases; but, whether so or not, the conference had the right to prescribe it as the method of ascertaining the will or request of the society, in the absence of any contrary rule, and so it became the instrumental process, of which all qualified electors were bound to take notice. All had the opportunity of voting. It was the duty of all to vote, and those not voting became bound by the result, because they are counted with the majority, as assenting to their action. 'To all questions put by the established organ, it is the duty of every member to respond, or be counted with the greater number, because he is supposed to have consented beforehand to the process pre-established to ascertain the general will.' Com. v. Green, 4 Whart. 804. 'This rule is fundamental in all forms of popular government, and it can be overborne only by express direction to the contrary. It would be entirely competent for a society to adopt a different rule, but such purpose should clearly appear. In Craig v. First Presby. Church of Pittsburgh, 88 Pa. 45, 82 Am. Rep. 417, the question turned upon the construction of a statute which made the assent of 'a majority of the members of such society or church, expressed at a church election,' essential. It was held that a majority of those voting at the election was sufficient. We quote from the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Paxson: 'It may be asked, however, what is meant by the "majority?" Does it mean the concurrence of the major part of those who happen to be present at a regular corporate meeting, or does it mean a concurrence of the majority of a whole body? There is this distinction between a corporate act to be done by a definite number of persons, and one to be performed by an indefinite number: In the first case, it is to be observed that a majority is necessary to constitute a quorum, and that no act can be done unless a majority be present; in the latter, a majority of any number of those who appear may act. And where a corporation is composed of several integral parts, and each part consists of a definite number, a majority of each part must be present, to constitute a quorum. But where a corporation consists of several integral parts, one of which is indefinite, if any number of persons composing the latter, however small, are present, after having been duly summoned, it is sufficient. The distinction is between a definite and an indefinite number. In the former case a majority must be present, whereas, in the latter, a majority of those present may act, whether a majority of the whole body or not. When, therefore, the legislature, by the Act of 18th April, 1877, provided for ascertaining the wishes of a majority of the members by a church election, it is fair to presume that the majority intended by the act was the majority of those who should attend and vote at such election. The act provides for taking the sense of the congregation in the usual manner, and prescribes no new rule as to what shall be binding upon them. Had it been intended to require the assent of a majority of all the members, whether present at the meeting or not, such intention might, and probably would, have been expressed clearly in the act.' It needs no argument to enforce the applicability of this authority to the case in hand. The reasoning applies as well to a case where the law requires two thirds, as where a simple majority is sufficient. The size or extent of the majority is immaterial. That is governed by the act of submission. The important fact to be observed is that by 'the whole society' we have an indefinite number,—manifestly so; and, when such a factor enters into the case, those voting are regarded as the whole body, provided always, that no contrary rule is expressed in the law itself, and that it is at an election legally ordered. That the election held throughout the churches in November, 1888, was a legal election, we can have no doubt whatever. It was in the power of the general conference to order it. The constitution provided for its own change, by the general conference, upon a request of two thirds of the whole society, but is silent as to how this request was to be preferred. The necessary inference is that, with respect to all such matters of detail, the conference had full power to act. The essential purpose was to prevent any change, except as it might be agreed to by a two-thirds vote, fairly ascertained, upon a fair submission of the question to the whole society. Any different construction of this constitutional provision would impose upon the society methods not only unreasonable, but wholly impracticable.

"But the sufficiency of this vote, judged by the constitutional requirement, does not depend upon the correctness of this reasoning, satisfactory and convincing as it is to ourselves. It can be vindicated in a way so conclusive as to end all discussion. The interpretation of this constitutional provision was a proper subject for the judicial action of the general conference. If susceptible of different constructions, it had the right to say what it meant,—whether two thirds of all the members of the society, or two thirds of those voting at the election; and, acting strictly within its powers, it did decide that it meant two thirds of those voting. From that decision no appeal lies, for there is no higher tribunal within the church, and we cannot rejudge its decrees. The law upon this subject is aptly and concisely expressed in Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 666: 'The right to organize voluntary religious associations to assist in the expression and dissemination of any religious doctrine, and to create tribunals for the decision of controverted questions of faith within the association, and for the ecclesiastical government of all the individual members, congregations, and officers within the general association, is unquestioned. All who unite themselves to such a body do so with an implied consent to this government, and are bound to submit to it. But it would be a vain consent, and would lead to the total subversion of such religious bodies, if any one aggrieved by one of their decisions could appeal to the secular courts, and have them reversed. It is of the essence of these religious unions, and of their right to establish tribunals for the decision of questions arising among themselves, that those decisions should be binding in all cases of ecclesiastical cognizance, subject only to such appeals as the organism itself provides for.' This same doctrine has repeatedly been held by our own supreme court. Indeed, it has long since passed beyond discussion, into the settled law of the land. It is sufficient to refer to the cases of German Reformed Church v. Com., 3 Pa. 291, and McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 10, without quoting therefrom. Notwithstanding the conclusiveness of these authorities in establishing the sufficiency of the vote, we preferred to reach our conclusions through the line of argument first attempted, for the reason that by the inquiry there pursued we were able, not only to determine whether the course adopted by the conference was conformable to the constitution of the society, but at the same time see whether the end had been accomplished by considerate and proper regard for the rights of a dissenting minority. On both these issues we find for the plaintiffs. The change was made agreeably to the conventional law of the church, by methods entirely fair, and the legitimacy of the liberal general conference has been in no way affected thereby.

"We turn now to the other branch of the defendants' contention, viz. that which relates to the change in the confession of faith. It seems to have been mistakenly assumed by the general conference that the provision in the constitution for a change of that instrument applied as well to the confession of faith, and the same procedure was resorted to in making the change. The confession of faith is no part of the constitution, and the latter makes no provision for the change of the former. It simply forbids the general conference to pass any rule or ordinance changing or abolishing it. With this limitation upon the power of the general conference, a change was impossible, under that constitution. To effect a change by constitutional methods, regular procedure would have first required a change in the constitution itself. The mistake that was made is obvious; but whatever effect it may have upon the authority and binding force of the new confession,—upon which we express no opinion,—we cannot allow it the significance in this contention which defendants' counsel claim for it. It can serve no purpose here to inquire into the regularity of the procedure by which the change in the confession was effected. We made the inquiry with respect to the constitution only that we might determine the identity of the organic structure. On no other grounds would the inquiry have been pertinent. We could have no such reason for investigating the procedure as it relates to the confession, for, even though the irregularity be established,—and we concede as much,—the identity of the organized society remains. The latter is not affected by a change of faith. If the contention were that the new had not supplanted the old confession, because of the irregular procedure in its adoption, and we were competent to pass upon that question, an inquiry into all the proceedings which led up to its adoption would be necessary. But both parties to this controversy assume that a valid and binding change was made, and therefore there is nothing left to consider but the effect and consequence of this change. The proposition insisted upon by the defendants, and which we are asked to affirm, is that the new confession of faith differs so radically and materially from the old that by the adoption of the former a new and distinctive church has been established, and that to allow the property involved in the present dispute to be used by such church would be to divert the trust from the purposes intended by its founders. So much of this proposition as implies the power and duty of the court to interfere, and require a trust to be administered according to the intention of its founders, when a misapplication is attempted, is conceded, of course. The duty of the court in such case is obvious. The trust which is recognized by the law will be protected by the law, and, where the protection of the law is inadequate to the purpose, equity will come to the relief; for has it not been said that 'a trust is the child of the law, and more especially the ward of chancery?' But the other matters embraced in the proposition invite closer scrutiny. They suggest important and material inquiries.

"The existence of the trust or religious use is not denied. The origin of the title is found in John Dome, who by his deed declares that the lot was purchased for the purpose of erecting a church of the United Brethren in Christ, and who then conveyed it to certain parties, trustees of said congregation, for the use aforesaid. If the conclusion already reached, viz., that the division of the local church here represented by the plaintiffs, known as the 'Liberals,' is the United Brethren congregation of Greencastle, because it is in connection with, and in subordination to, the legitimate government of the organized society, it needs no discussion to show that, so far as the will of the founders is expressed in the grant, they are the true and proper beneficiaries of the use. But it is contended on behalf of the defendants that it is a necessary implication, derivable from the terms of this grant, that the beneficiary under the trust was to be a congregation of the United Brethren in Christ, distinguished and individuated as such, not only by name, but by adherence to the doctrines held and advocated by that church when the grant was made. To state it still more concisely, we give the proposition as we find it in the brief of the defendants' counsel,—that the [constitution and] confession of faith are as fully a part of every trust deed of conveyance as if written therein.' That the founders of this trust could have made adherence to the confession of faith, as it then stood, a condition of the use, will not be denied, since "cujus est dare, ejus est disponere." But we are asked to go beyond this, and hold that, notwithstanding no such condition is expressed in the grant, yet the law implies as much, and imputes to the donor a purpose to impose, as a condition of the enjoyment of his bounty, that the congregation should continue devoted to an unchanging and unchangeable faith. If such be the law, it makes largely for the defendants' contention, in spite of the fact, already ascertained, that the legitimate succession is with the plaintiffs.

"The essential elements of every trust are determined by the will of the donor. He it is who founds it, and whatever conditions he has imposed, and whatever purpose he has defined, if lawful, will be enforced, so that the end he had in view may be secured. The maxim of the old feudal system is still applied to modern grants, 'tenor est qui legem dat feudo.' In the present case the donors or founders are those who contributed to the purchase of the lot, and the effort must be to ascertain the interests they desired to promote, and the purpose they had in view. It is of no consequence that the present house of worship was erected at a much later period by the voluntary subscriptions of members who stood in no relation to the congregation when the lot was purchased. By the common law, even subsequent contributors have no other right of direction than that which the founder has prescribed, for they come in and give their money on a basis already established, and they can neither add to it, nor take anything from it. Presbyterian Cong. v. Johnston, 1 Watts & S. 87. The rules of construction require that we must first have recourse to the instrument by which the trust was created, and the use declared. Here, then, it is the deed from Dome to the trustees. If that expresses with sufficient clearness for an intelligent understanding the wishes and intentions of the founders, we are forbidden to look beyond, and must accept what is there declared as conclusive. If its language interprets itself, we have no occasion to resort to rules of art or precedents to guide us. The deed is as follows: 'Know all men by these presents, that the within-described lot of ground, No. 97, was purchased for the purpose of erecting a church for the United Brethren in Christ, and the said John Dome doth, by these presents, release and quitclaim his right of the within lot of ground to George Zeigler, Jacob Wingerd, Samuel Lenhard, and Solomon Moor, trustees of said congregation, for the only use and interest above described, and for no other purpose.' But very little is here expressed. Did the donors intend more? They intended all that is legally and fairly inferable from the language used, but to what extent does this carry us? We have a use declared for a particular congregation for the erection of a church for the United Brethren in Christ. That this contemplated that the congregation should be in connection and association with the larger organization known as the 'Church,' is an unavoidable inference. Indeed, it may be said to be expressed, and it is about all that is. A denominational designation is used. What significance attaches to this? Can we infer from this fact that the distinctive faith, or rather the entire creed, of that particular denomination, whether distinctive or not, was made an essential element of the trust? Such, as we understand it, is the defendants' contention, and they would have us read in the words, 'United Brethren in Christ,' the entire confession of faith that was adopted in 1815. That by the use of a distinctively denominational name very much may be expressed, will not be denied. It is often of great help in determining the proper limits of a grant. In Hale v. Boerett, 58 N. H. 70, 16 Am. Rep. 82, it was held that when a conveyance is made to, or a trust created for the benefit or use of, a religious society, by its denominational name,—which denominational name is descriptive of the fundamental doctrines of the sect to which it belongs, with no other particular designation in the deed of the tenets or doctrines which it is to be used to advance or support,—the denominational name may be a sufficient guide as to the nature of the trust, so far as respects doctrines which are admitted to be fundamental. In the case in which this was said, the denominational name was 'The First Unitarian Society of Christians in Dover,' and it was very properly held that the terms 'Unitarian' and 'Christian' were both expressive of fundamental and essential doctrines, and that, by the use of a denominational name in which both these terms occurred, it was made an implied condition of the grant that the society should avow no doctrines inconsistent with these. But of what fundamental doctrine is the denominational name of 'United Brethren in Christ' expressive? If any, it determines the use to that extent. It helps, nothing to inquire what are the distinctive doctrines of the denomination, or whether it has any. What concerns us is to ascertain what distinctive doctrines are expressed in the denominational name. Arminianism may be, and we are told is, one of the fundamental doctrines of the church, but it is not ascertainable from the denominational name. The name is not contradictory of extreme Calvinism. So, opposition to all secret associations may be a distinguishing characteristic, but the name does not so inform us. If this name indicates anything as to doctrine, beyond the divinity of Christ, and the brotherhood of all believers in Him, we fail utterly to see it. As to these doctrines, the name furnishes us with an unerring guide, but its value stops right there.

"The cases all distinguish between a dedication of property to support particular tenets, and a dedication to support such tenets in subjection to a particular church government; and the rule is that when the cestus que trust is a congregation, indicated by its denominational name, the law will make it a condition of the grant that the congregation maintains the appropriate ecclesiastical connection, but when nothing appears in the grant, except the church name, to indicate the form of belief, the law will make conditions only of those fundamental doctrines which the name clearly expresses. In Miller v. Gable, 2 Denio, 510, it is said: 'There may be a support of tenets without subjection to any ecclesiastical power which upholds them; but it may be a condition of grant of property that a trust is to be maintained in subordination to a particular power, as, if a church be established in connection with a particular ecclesiastical body, a severance from that body would be a violation of the trust.' In our own state we have entire unanimity of decision on the general principles which govern in these cases; and, while we find no single one—where matters of faith were the disturbing cause—which turns upon a declaration of use so meager as this, yet they all accord with the authorities cited, and sustain the rule as we have stated it. The subordination to a particular church government may be made a fundamental condition, is the doctrine declared in Presbyterian Cong. v. Johnston, 1 Watts & S. 87. It is repeated and emphasized in Means v. Pres- byterian Church, 8 Watts & S. 308. In App. v. Lutheran Cong. of Belingroove, 6 Pa. 201, where the grant is almost identical with this, it is not only decided that it may be, but that it is, an essential condition; and in that case there is nothing from which such condition could be inferred but the denominational name. So, too, in Rohls's App., 69 Pa. 465, 8 Am. Rep. 276, where the dedication was almost exactly similar, — 'in trust for the use of the said German Reformed Church.' 'The principle which governs in all such cases,' says Mr. Justice Sharswood, 'is old and well established, and has frequently been asserted by this court. Whenever a church or religious society has been originally endowed in connection with, or in subordination to, some ecclesiastical organization and form of government, it can no more unite with some other organization, or become independent, than it can renounce its faith or doctrine, and adopt others.' McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 14, and Schnorr's App., 67 Pa. 146, 5 Am. Rep. 415, are to the same effect. These authorities all recognize this ecclesiastical connection, implying submission, as a fundamental condition, and several of them, as we have indicated, infer this condition from the use of the denominational name in the grant; and, however much any of them may seem to emphasize adherence to faith and doctrine as a condition, it will be found to be only in cases where there is an expressed condition to this effect, and even in such they limit it to doctrines which are distinctive and fundamental. In those of our state cases where the grant most resembles this one, the effort was to carry away the local church property, or at least to secede from the original organization. In Schnorr's App., supra, one party, having declared themselves independent of all synods, and absolved from the government of the church of which they had been a part, claimed the local church property, notwithstanding the fact that it had been conveyed 'for the use of the congregation of the German Evangelical Reformed Church, and with the condition that no change shall be made in said congregation for any other denomination.' It was in this case, and with reference to this positive prohibition in the grant, that Justice Sharswood, in expressing his dissent from the language used in McGinnis v. Watson, supra, uses the emphatic language which is so much relied upon by the defendants. He says: 'Courts, which have the supervision and control of all corporations and unincorporated societies or associations, must be guided by surer and clearer principles than those to be derived from the nature of intellectual and spiritual life. The guaranty of religious freedom has nothing to do with the property. It does not guarantee freedom to steal churches. It secures to individuals the right of withdrawing, forming a new society, with such ends and government as they please, raising from their own means another fund, and building another house of worship, but it does not confer upon them the right of taking the property consecrated to other use by those who may now be sleeping in their graves.' What is this but saying that the will and intentions of the donor alone determine the limitations and conditions of the trust, and that, when these are clearly expressed, the law of the land, which is superior to any supposed 'law of intellectual and spiritual life,' in its operation on property rights, at least, will enforce them? In App's Case, supra, the bequest was claimed by a congregation which did not belong to the old Lutheran Church, was attached to a new synod, and not under the same ecclesiastical government that ruled when the bequest was made. McGinnis v. Watson, supra, was a case of secession. In Presbyterian Cong. v. Johnston, supra, there was no ecclesiastical connection prescribed. And so we might distinguish all the cases from the one we are now considering. None of these suggest anything inconsistent with the rule of the interpretation as we have stated it, while in several, as we have shown, it has been applied in a most conclusive way.

"Confining our search, then, for the intentions of these donors, to the words of the conveyance from Dome, can we discover any intention to impose other conditions than that the beneficiary must be a congregation in connection with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ? that it must be distinctively Christian in faith, and accept the doctrine of the brotherhood of all believers in Christ? If more was intended, could it not have been easily expressed? As was said in Princeton v. Adams, 10 Cush. 129, it is perfectly easy for persons giving their own private property to a religious use to limit that use, and devote the property to a particular faith; and as was said in Atty-Gen. v. Dublin, 88 N. H. 510, 'they need no professional assistance or technical learning to supply them with a peculiar phraseology. Any intelligible language will answer the purpose. They can have no difficulty in saying, in some comprehensible form, that they intend the dissemination of the thirty-nine articles of the English Church, or the Westminster Catechism; the doctrines of Luther, or Loyla; of Edmonds, or Channing, or Jefferson; the tenets held by some sect at a certain time, or such as it may hold from time to time in the course of its existence in a changing world. If they intend a theological limitation, they will express it; and then the court may be called upon to decide, by legal rules settled by the wisdom of ages, not what the faith is, but what limitation is expressed by the words used.' If, by our interpretation, we have confined this trust within limits too narrow, to what extent are they to be opened up? Can it be maintained for a moment that they are to include, as an essential condition, the entire confession of faith which was recognized by the denomination when the trust was created? If so, it must be by necessary intentment from the single fact that there was such a confession in existence. Any such view not only imputes to the donors what they did not express, and which could have been readily expressed if intended, but it ignores what we have tried to show was the paramount purpose, because it is expressed, to wit, to place the subject of the trust in a congregation in subjection to the general order and government of the church at large. The United Brethren in Christ were an organized body long before the trust was created. So, too, the Greencastle congregation had an earlier existence, and was in ecclesiastical connection with the general body, and subject to its authority and legislation, when the property was dedicated to its use. This much the donors knew, and are presumed to have had in contemplation. Is it reasonable to suppose, under such circumstances, that they intended a use inconsistent with the submission of the congregation to established authority? We think it evident that the paramount purpose was to secure the property to the local society, in subordination to the higher authority of the church, whereby the regular connection and relation of the parts to the whole would be secured; and surely, if this be correct, such a qualified use as is here contended for would be inconsistent with this purpose, except upon the theory that it is beyond the power of the church to change its creed,—an assumption which we cannot allow. Why cannot the church change its creed? It made it; and why cannot the same power which made, unmake? It can change its name, its order of worship, its discipline, its government. Then, why not its creed? To deny it this right is to deny its existence as an organized society, or else deny it the freedom of conscience which is guaranteed to the individual. The power to make implies the power to change. It is inherent and inextinguishable as well in churches as in individuals. We are not denying that certain legal consequences affecting property rights may result from a change of creed. What we are saying is that the power to change the creed is implied in the very existence of the church, and that this power inhered in the church before, and at the time when, this particular property was dedicated to a local congregation in connection with the church. This the donors are supposed to have known, and to have indicated the use accordingly. With this knowledge, either actual or imputed, of the inherent power of the church over its creed, is it not, and ought it not to be, a controlling circumstance in the case, that no condition whatever in regard to faith or doctrine, beyond what is expressed in the denominational name, can be found in the letter of the grant? We certainly so regard it, and in this view we are largely supported by the case of Gibson v. Armstrong, 7 B. Mon. 481, which stands out with the prominence of a guidepost. It is no answer to say that it was in the belief that the church would adhere to its confession of faith, as then written, for all time to come, that the dedication of the property was made. That is assuming a fact, in support of which there is no evidence at all. But grant it to be a fact. What have we to do, in determining this question, with the belief and inducements which operated on the minds of the donors when they have expressed in the grant itself the use they intend? If the grant were doubtful or uncertain,—which it is not,—we could resort to extrinsic circumstances, and consider, perhaps, the belief and motives of the grantors as aids, but not otherwise. This grant cannot be regarded as requiring extrinsic evidence to construe it, simply because it may be thought by some, from the circumstances under which it was made, and its brevity, that more was intended than is expressed. Any such rule would open the way for extrinsic evidence to disturb, if not destroy, any trust in existence. And when a church, in the exercise of its undoubted right, in a legal and sufficient way, changes its creed, what property rights are affected thereby? It unquestionably forfeits its right to all property, the use of which was conditioned by the donor, in his grant, on an unchangeable creed, but nothing beyond. We have argued to show that the conditions in the present case are that the property be used by a Christian congregation in connection with a particular denomination, holding to the doctrine of the brotherhood of all believers in Christ. Any connection with a different denomination, or the avowal of a faith inconsistent with the doctrines of the Christian religion, or the brotherhood of believers in Christ, would be a perversion of this trust, such as the law would forbid and correct; but, until such radical and fundamental perversion as this is attempted, those whom we have found to compose the true and real congregation at Greencastle, and here represented by the plaintiffs, are entitled to the undisturbed possession and enjoyment of the church property.

"In the view we have taken of this case, any further examination into the changes made in the confession of faith is unnecessary. It remains distinctively and unequivocally Christian in its character. So much is conceded, and it is all that concerns us to know. We may, however, be permitted to add that, in comparing the new with the old, we fail to see how any one professing his belief in either could be denied membership or fellowship in the society which professes belief in the other. Literally, they are not the same; but if inconsistent with, or repugnant to, each other, with respect to any doctrine which has ever been made the basis of separate denominational existence, such fact has not been brought to our notice. The schoolmen may have made some of the points of difference the subject of their violent polemics, and it may interest the student of history or science to know just how they were regarded by these men who were so wasteful of their learning and zeal; but, in modern Christian thought, they are not considered of sufficient importance to disturb the unity of the faith. Since, then, the liberal congregation at Greencastle, here represented by the plaintiffs in the original bill, is in connection with, and subordinate to, the authority of the legitimate Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and since none of the conditions of the grant under which it holds the property now in dispute have been violated, it follows that these plaintiffs are entitled to the relief prayed for, and that the defendants' cross-bill must be dismissed."

Mr. O. C. Bowers, for appellants:

I. The constitution of 1841 was, from the time of its adoption, the organic law of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ.

Philomath College v. Wyatt (Or.) Oct. 5, 1892.

II. The amended constitution of 1889 was not legally or regularly adopted in accordance with the method provided in the constitution of 1841 for the amendment or change thereof.

III. The election, at which it is supposed by the plaintiffs that the amended constitution and revised confession of faith were ratified by the people of the church, was not an election authorized by law, and therefore those voting had no power to represent or to bind those who did not choose to vote.

The 4th article of the constitution of 1841 provides, "there shall be no alteration of the foregoing constitution, unless by request of two thirds of the whole society."

The words "vote" and "request" are not the equivalent of each other. They are not synonyms.

The framers of this constitution when they used the words "request of two thirds of the whole society" had in their minds voluntary petitions coming up from two thirds of the whole membership asking that this or that be done.

"Request of two thirds of the whole society" is not to be construed to mean two thirds of those voting.

Com. v. Wickersham, 66 Pa. 184; State v. Winkelmeier, 35 Mo. 108; State v. Sutterfield, 54 Mo. 391; State v. Foraker, 6 L. R. A. 422, 46 Ohio St. 677; State v. Swift, 69 Ind. 505; State v. Lancaster County Comrs. 6 Neb. 474; State v. Babcock, 17 Neb. 188; People v. Brown, 11 Ill. 478; People v. Wiant, 48 Ill. 268; Egypt v. Hanover Twp. 25 Ohio St. 618.

This election was not authorized by law, and therefore those voting had no power to represent or bind those who did not choose to vote.

Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 47, 15 Am. Rep. 568; Com. v. Green, 4 Whart. 581.

An election must be by virtue of legal authority. There is no inherent power in the people to hold elections.

6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 298, 294.

An election can only be held by a proper officer; and the power to order and to hold elections cannot be delegated.

Ibid.; Com. v. Baxter, 35 Pa. 263; People v. Mathewson, 47 Cal. 442; People v. Johnston, 6 Cal. 678.

IV. Under the constitution of 1841 the confession of faith was absolutely unchangeable at least so long as that constitution remained the organic law of the church.

The 4th section of article 2 of the constitution provides: "No rule or ordinance shall at any time be passed to change or do away the confession of faith as it now stands, nor to destroy the itinerant plan."

The claim that a majority of the people, with no right reserved in the constitution to do so, can make a new confession of faith, is revolutionary and communistic. It would subvert not only every associated church organization, but all the secret orders, associations of all kinds, and even the national and state governments.

It is denounced and condemned in principle 22 L. R. A.

by the Supreme Court of the United States in the great Dorr rebellion case of Luther v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 1, 12 L. ed. 561, in which the state court of Rhode Island declared that there was no inherent right in the people to revolutionize a state government, whose constitution prescribes a mode of changing its constitution. The same principle is held in the cases which affirm that a state constitution cannot be changed except in the mode therein authorized.

State v. Swift, 69 Ind. 525; State v. Foraker, 6 L. R. A. 422, 46 Ohio St. 677; Collier v. Frierson, 24 Ala. 100.

The prohibition against change enters into and is a part of the implied contract of church membership as fully as if written in every trust conveyance of church property.

Austin v. Bearing, 16 N. Y. 112, 69 Am. Dec. 672, note; Wayland, Moral Science, 384.

V. The revised confession of faith was not adopted in accordance with any law of the church, not even in accordance with the provisions of the amended constitution of 1889.

VI. The revised confession of faith is materially different from the old, in that it changes many of the doctrines contained in the old, rejects or ignores others, and adds new doctrines thereto.

VII. The courts have jurisdiction to inquire and determine whether or not the action of the church authorities in relation to the adoption of the amended constitution and revised confession of faith, was in accordance with its own organic law; and if it was not, to declare such action ultra vires and void, especially in view of the fact that property rights are involved.

The doctrine held in our own state as to the jurisdiction of the courts over questions of this character is clearly shown by the following cases, which at the same time indicate with equal clearness the parties to whom the property of a divided church or congregation will be awarded.

In the Reformed Presbyterian Church the general synod, its highest judicatory, is bound by its system of religious principles with the same force as individual members.

McAuley's App. 77 Pa. 397.

In the Reformed Presbyterian Church the powers of the general synod are derived from and contained in the church standards, and the exercise by it of an authority opposed to or subversive of such standard is ultra vires, and cannot of right demand the respect and obedience of its subordinates.

Kerr's App. 89 Pa. 97.

The title to the property of a divided congregation is in that part which is acting in harmony with its own law, and the ecclesiastical laws, usages, etc., which were accepted before the dispute, are the standard to determine which is right.

Schnorr's App. 67 Pa. 138, 5 Am. Rep. 415; McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 9; Roach's App. 69 Pa. 462, 8 Am. Rep. 275.

In Hochreiter's App., 98 Pa. 479, this court held that a new constitution of an unincorporated society not having been adopted in accordance with the provisions of the existing constitution, was illegal and of no effect.

In matters of faith and doctrine churches are left to speak for themselves, but when rights of property are in question, courts will interfere.

Messrs. Rowe, Gillan & Stewart, for appellees:

The constitution of 1841 was never submitted to the people of the church for approval or rejection. Authority it had none during all its existence beyond that it acquired by the enactment of the conference.

A constitution is "the written instrument agreed upon by the people."

Cooley, Const. Lim. 5; State v. McCann, 4 Lea. 9.

An instrument of government made and adopted by the people.

People v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 486.

A fundamental law or basis of government, established by the people in their original sovereign capacity.

McKean v. Devries, 3 Barb. 198.

A form of government delineated by the mighty hand of the people.

Vanhorne v. Dorrance, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 808, 1 L. ed. 393.

An agreement of the people in their individual capacities.

State v. Parkhurst, 9 N. J. L. 528.

In our own state the active assent of the people is recognized as of the very essence of constitutional validity.

Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 89, 15 Am. Rep. 568; Woods' App. 75 Pa. 59.

As to the church bodies acting under it, the inferior bodies had no choice; constitution or not, it was a valid enactment of the church legislature and as such bound them until repealed. The general conference acted under it probably because it did not care to repeal it. Certainly no argument that it could not repeal it is to be drawn from the fact that it did not do so.

The general conference of 1815 enacted the confession of faith, the conference of 1841 enacted this body of law which it called a constitution. Both bodies were undoubtedly competent to go so far, but when the latter attempted to withdraw both these important subjects from the control of its successors, it transcended its powers, and its acts were void.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 146, 147; Bloomer v. Stolley, 5 McLean, 158; Com. v. Lancaster, 5 Watts, 162; Wall v. State, 23 Ind. 150; State v. Oskins, 28 Ind. 384; Oleson v. Green Bay & L. P. R. Co. 86 Wis. 888. See also Christ Church v. Pope, 8 Gray, 140; Kellogg v. Oshkosh, 14 Wis. 624; 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 691.

Even when a by-law requires that no alteration of a law shall be made except by a two-thirds vote of the members, yet the same body by which the by-law was made may repeal it by a majority.

Richardson v. Union Cong. Soc. of Frances-town, 58 N. H. 187.

Although voluntary associations frequently make constitutions and pass by-laws, which they declare are not to be altered, except in a 22 L. R. A.

certain manner, yet their constitution and laws may, at any time, be altered or abrogated by the same power that created them, and the vote of any subsequent meeting, abrogating or altering such constitution, though passed only by a majority, has as much efficacy as a previous vote establishing them.

Smith v. Nelson, 18 Vt. 512.

An attempt on the part of a legislative body to limit for the future its own powers is void because it is a betrayal of the trust reposed in it, and a perversion of the authority lodged with it.

Mott v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 30 Pa. 35, 72 Am. Dec. 664. See also Cooley, Const. Lim. 148, note 2; Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079.

From histories of the church it appears that at the time the constitution of 1841 was adopted, there was no way of ascertaining the number of members in the denomination. Knowing, then, that the membership was uncertain in number, and the utter impossibility of ascertaining at any time whether two thirds or any other proportion of the members had joined in a petition, how can the general conference of 1841 be said to have intended that a literal request or petition signed by two thirds of its indefinite and indefinable number must be presented to a subsequent conference before any steps could be taken looking towards a change in the constitution?

Every interpretation that leads to an absurdity ought to be rejected.

Vattel, Law of Nations, bk. II., chap. 17, § 282; Smith, Stat. & Const. Constr. 695; Story, Const. Abridged, § 194.

"When a law becomes the instrumental process of amendment," says Chief Justice Agnew, in Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 47, 15 Am. Rep. 568, "it is not because the legislature possesses any inherent power to change the existing constitution through a convention, but because it is the only means through which an authorized consent of the whole people, the entire state, can be lawfully obtained in a state of peace."

The election held under this commission's direction was a legal one and one of which the members of the church were bound to take notice.

Com. v. Green, 4 Whart. 604.

It follows as a necessary result that if the proposed changes received the approval of two thirds of those who voted, the constitutional requirement of "two thirds of the whole association" were satisfied.

Craig v. First Presby. Church of Pittsburgh, 83 Pa. 42, 82 Am. Rep. 417; Cass County v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 360, 24 L. ed. 416; St. Joseph Twp. v. Rogers, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 644, 21 L. ed. 328; Carroll County Supra. v. Smith, 111 U. S. 556, 28 L. ed. 517; People v. Wiant, 48 Ill. 263; State v. Woodford, 15 Kan. 500; McCrary, Elections, 8d ed. § 178; Lamb v. Cain, 14 L. R. A. 518, 129 Ind. 496.

The interpretation of this constitutional provision was a proper subject for the judicial action of the general conference. If susceptible of different constructions it had the right to say what it meant, whether two thirds of the members of the society, or two thirds of those voting at the election, and acting strictly within its powers it did decide that it meant two thirds of those voting. From that decision no appeal lies, for there is no higher tribunal in the church, and we cannot rejudge its decrees.

Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 666; German Reformed Church v. Com. 3 Pa. 291; McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 10; Shannon v. Frost, 8 B. Mon. 253; Gibson v. Armstrong, 7 B. Mon. 481; Harmon v. Dreher, 1 Speers, Eq. 87; Ferraria v. Vasconcelles, 23 Ill. 456.

The contention that the general conference has not judicially determined the construction of the disputed clause in the constitution cannot be sanctioned.

There is perhaps no more indefinite line of demarcation known to our law than that which separates legislative and judicial acts.

Greenough v. Greenough, 11 Pa. 499, 51 Am. Dec. 567; Wayman v. Southard, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 47, 6 L. ed. 263.

How, then, shall the courts make for the conference this distinction which it itself has ignored?

Every department of government, invested with certain constitutional powers, must in the first instance, but not exclusively (that is, to the exclusion of the superior departments), be the judge of its powers or it could not act.

Kendall v. Kingston, 5 Mass. 524.

So with the general conference. Its power to construe the laws of the church is undoubted.

The positive provisions of the constitution of 1841 are so plainly referable to the general conference that they seem to indicate unmistakably that what the framers had in mind was the formulation of a set of rules by which that body should be guided in the future.

Construing article 2, section 4, then, with reference to this evident object, it becomes apparent that the two can only be harmonized by understanding the prohibition contained in the former as applied to the passage of any rule or ordinance by the general conference.

Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 73.

Is it to be presumed that the conference intended to go beyond its proper power and to fetter the hands of the people to which it itself, as it had declared, looked for authority? Is it to be presumed, in the absence of express words to that effect, that it intended to abridge that sovereign authority? Such a construction should never be admitted "unless the language used be too clear to admit of a doubt."

Gilman v. Sheboygan, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 510, 17 L. ed. 788; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 287.

It follows, then, that if this prohibition was aimed only at the conference, the power to alter the confession to any extent they wished remained with the people, even though such power were not specially reserved.

Luther v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 1, 12 L. ed. 581.

And the only way in which that change could be accomplished was by a "law, as the instrumental process of raising the body for revision and conveying to it the powers of the people."

Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 47, 15 Am. Rep. 563.

The true test as to the ownership of the property in dispute is, "Which of these parties represents a congregation in ecclesiastical connection with the United Brethren Church—in 22 L. R. A. proper succession to the church of that name as it existed in 1838—and professing no doctrine inconsistent with a belief in Christ and the brotherhood of believers in Him?" We confidently affirm that the application of that test must be conclusive in favor of the appellees.

To set the civil courts in motion there must be so plain and fundamental a change as to destroy the identity of the society to make what is in effect a new church.

Miller v. Gable, supra; Trustees of Lutheran Cong. of Pine Hill v. St. Michael's Evangelical Church of Pine Hill, 48 Pa. 21; Keyser v. Stanifer, 6 Ohio, 363.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The right to the decree asked for in this case depends on a question of ecclesiastical identity. The question is, which of the parties, and organizations represented by them, is the church and society known as the "United Brethren in Christ?" The society was a unit prior to 1839. It had a system of polity and a creed which were accepted throughout the whole church. They had taken form gradually, with the growth of the church, from a small beginning a hundred years or more ago, until they were reduced to form by the general conference. This was done, so far as the confession of faith is concerned, in 1815. The constitution was formulated and adopted in 1841. The confession of faith remained without any considerable change for three quarters of a century. The constitution had been recognized and accepted as the fundamental law of the society for a half century. The system of polity provided for the grouping of individuals into local congregations or churches. An indefinite number of churches were grouped to form a circuit. Circuits were united to make a district, and these, held together by the denominational bond, made up the church. The ecclesiastical power of the society was distributed through a succession of courts or tribunals. The church officers exercised this power in the individual congregation. In the circuit, it was exercised by the quarterly conference; in the district, by the annual conference; and, for the whole society, the general quadrennial conference was the supreme legislative and judicial body. Its confession of faith was brief, and in its outlines was what may be described as "Christological." Under these simple fundamental rules of polity and articles of faith, the society had grown until in 1839 its membership numbered over 200,000, distributed over many states. It had become one of the influential Protestant organizations, and was the owner of much valuable church property. The local church at Greencastle was organized and officered prior to 1889 under the authority of this united and prosperous society, and was in full connection with it. The officers of this local church are the plaintiffs in this case, and they insist that since 1889, as truly as before, they have the right to the possession of the house of worship, and the lands appurtenant, belonging to the church at Greencastle.

Looking at the position of the defendants, we find that on the church records, as far back as 1865, there is evidence to show a growing difference of opinion in regard to three points of polity. These were the admission of lay representation, the rates of representation, and the attitude of the church towards secret societies. The Constitution of 1841 (art. 2, § 7) contained this provision: "There shall be no connection with secret combinations." This declaration was indefinite. It was susceptible of an interpretation so broad as to prohibit membership in the various social, charitable, and mutual aid societies that have grown so rapidly in number and in favor in recent years. It might with equal, if not better, reason, be construed as having reference to unlawful secret combinations, and not intended to interfere with lawful organizations, whose advantages were restricted to their own membership. The attitude of those who held to the first of these positions was regarded by many as imposing an unnecessarily hard restriction upon the freedom of action of the individual members of the church. The sentiment in favor of increased liberality towards the laity, in admitting them to participate in the government of the society, and removing unnecessary restrictions upon their individual action, grew steadily. Finally, in 1885, it had become so strong that a decided majority of the members of the general conference took action upon the subject. In a carefully worded resolution, they expressed their belief that both the creed and constitution could be improved in clearness and fullness of statement, and by this means brought more thoroughly into harmony with the views and wishes of the church. This was a mild form of revision, and the conference entered very deliberately upon it. The first thing done was to raise a committee of thirteen members to consider the subject, and report. After considerable deliberation, eleven members of the committee united in a report setting forth: "It is the sense and belief of your committee that the constitution, as it now stands, is not in harmony with the present wishes of our people, as has been indicated in discussion, petitions, and elections during the past year," and recommending that a commission, to consist of twenty-seven members, including all the bishops of the church, should be appointed to "consider our present confession of faith and constitution, and prepare such a form of belief, and such amended fundamental rules for the government of this church in the future, as will be best adapted, in their judgment, to secure its growth and efficiency in the work of evangelizing the world." This commission was made up so as to distribute its members among the several districts composing the society, and was subjected to the following lines of limitation, viz.: "To preserve unchanged, in substance, the present confession of faith, so far as it is clear; . . . to retain the present itinerant plan; . . . to keep sacred the general usages and distinctive principles of the church on all great moral reforms." When the commission should complete its work of revision along these narrow and conservative lines, it was instructed to submit it to the membership of the society for approval or disapproval, in such manner as to secure general attention to it, and place it in the power of every member who would do so to express his or her opinion. This action was in no sense revolutionary. It did not propose to cut loose from any distinctive theological doctrine, or from the general system of polity, theretofore held by the society. The commission entered upon its work, and revised both the confession of faith and the constitution, with a view to greater clearness and fullness of statement upon certain doctrines, and greater liberality towards the membership in their individual action upon the subject of secret societies. Both documents were put in a more connected and logical form; and were relieved from the indefiniteness and ambiguity of expression out of which the differences of interpretation had arisen. The revised documents were then submitted to the society for an expression for or against their adoption in lieu of the constitution and confession then in use. Nearly three years were given for discussion and examination. At the end of this time a vote was taken throughout the society. The returns showed a very large majority of the votes to be in favor of the substitution of the revised forms for the old. At the general conference of 1889 the commission reported its work, the submission of it to the society, the votes given for and against its adoption, and submitted the whole to the consideration of that body. In this report twenty-five of its members concurred. One bishop and one other person dissented, and submitted a minority report. The general conference then referred the majority report to a special committee, charged to examine and report whether the commission had followed the instructions given to it, kept within the prescribed limits, and submitted its plan of revision to the society in a proper manner. All but two of this committee joined in a report affirming that the commission had acted with fidelity, had observed the limitations imposed upon their action, and had submitted their work to the membership, by whom it had been approved. They therefore recommended that the bishops should issue a proclamation announcing the adoption of the revised documents, and declaring them to be the confession of faith and the constitution of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. This report was adopted by the very decisive vote of 110 yeas to 20 nays. The proclamation was accordingly made, and the revised forms became thereupon, and thereafter, the accepted and binding law of the church. Fifteen of the twenty who voted nay—Milton Wright, a bishop, being of the number—withdraw from the general conference at this stage of the proceedings, and organized another general conference at another place in the same city, and assumed to be the true general conference of the whole church, and to have the rightful authority to manage and control all the property, business, and work of the church. The original body, containing 115 members, kept on in its work. The new body, with fifteen members, entered upon a rival system of regulation and control. The local congregation at Greencastle divided over the same subject. The majority adhered to the original or majority conference. A minority followed the minority in the conference, organized a new body, and took possession of the house of worship and property belonging to the local church, and excluded the majority therefrom. The officers of this new congregation at Greencastle are the defendants. The subject of the litigation is the house of worship and other property of the church at that place. The question raised is which of these parties is, or represents, the Church of the United Brethren at Greencastle; for to that one possession of this property should be awarded.

It appears that the real estate in question was conveyed to trustees, for the use of "the United Brethren in Christ," in Greencastle, as early as 1828, by one John Dome. A church of the United Brethren was organized prior to, or during, that year, which was the beneficiary intended by the donor. It has had a continuous existence since. It was the only organized society of that name in Greencastle until the withdrawal of the fifteen members of the general conference in 1889, followed by the organization of a new conference, and the division of the church. The plaintiffs and their predecessors have been in continuous possession for more than sixty years. The prima facies of the situation is with them, and it is incumbent on those who claim a right to dispossess them, and hold the possession against them, to show affirmatively how and when their title accrued, and that it is a good and valid title. The learned counsel for the defendants fully and clearly understood the requirements of his position, and put the reasons on which he rested his contention into seven propositions. The first of these asserts the validity of the constitution of 1841. The fourth asserts the "absolute unchangeability" of the fundamental law of the church, at least as to the confession of faith, under that constitution. The second, third, and fifth deny the regularity and legality of the action of the conferences of 1885 and 1889. The sixth affirms that the revision made in 1889 was so radical as to be subversive, and to destroy the identity of the church. The seventh insists that the courts have jurisdiction to inquire into and determine these questions, in order to settle the title to the real estate now in controversy. It will appear from what we have already said that we assent to the first proposition. Acquiescence and use for fifty years settled that point. We are prepared to assent to the seventh proposition. It is the duty of the courts to settle the question of the right to the real estate conveyed by John Dome in trust for the Church of the United Brethren in Greencastle. The sixth proposition raises a question of fact. It asserts that the revision made a complete theological departure from the creed of the church, as it stood before 1889. The master has found that this is not so, and, on the other hand, that the theology of the creed of 1815, and that of the revision, are the same in every essential particular, differing only in clearness of expression, and completeness of statement. The learned judge of the court below, in an excellent opinion, has concurred in, and vindicated fully, this conclusion of the master: This question is therefore disposed of, unless clear error in the finding is pointed out. We have attentively considered the suggestions made to us on this subject by the appellant, we have examined the old and the revised confessions, we have read the testimony of the distinguished theological experts who were called to testify as to the alleged doctrinal differences, and we are satisfied that the master and the court were right in denying the sixth proposition. There has been no substantial departure from the ancient belief of the church. The revision is simply a clear and ample statement of the great doctrines that are to be found in the creed of 1815, or that logically result from them. The "general usages and distinctive principles of the church" are preserved. Identity in both polity and creed are undisturbed. We feel the more satisfaction with this conclusion since it is in harmony with that reached by the court of last resort in matters of faith and discipline, within the church itself, viz. the general conference, and with the conclusion reached by a clear majority of the entire membership. If the question was one of doctrine alone, we should feel inclined to treat the decision of the general conference as final, in accordance with the rule laid down in several cases, among which are App v. Lutheran Cong. of Selingsgrove, 6 Pa. 201; German Reformed Church v. Com. 8 Pa. 282; McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 9. Two of the questions raised by the defendants' propositions remain to be briefly considered: First, was the confession of faith absolutely unchangeable under the constitution of 1841? Second, if not, was the change made in 1889 so made as to have a binding force upon the church?

The appellants' argument upon the first of these questions rests on section 4, article 2, of the constitution of 1841. It is as follows: "Sec. 4. No rule or ordinance shall at any time be passed to change or do away with the confession of faith, as it now stands, nor to destroy the itinerant plan." This provision is not to receive a technical interpretation, but is to be construed in the light which the whole instrument throws upon it, and so as to advance the interests of the church and promote its objects. Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Coons, 6 Watts & S. 114; Com. v. Clark, 7 Watts & S. 127; Com. v. Hartman, 17 Pa. 119; Com. v. Maxwell, 27 Pa. 444. The purpose and effect of section 4, when so construed, is not to prohibit changes in the confession of faith that are in the interest of clearness of expression, or fullness of statement, of the accepted doctrines of the church, but to prevent changes in the doctrines to which the church was committed. The provision was not intended as an impassable barrier thrown in the way of improvement of all sorts, but as a protection against the introduction of heretical doctrine, destructive of the distinctive theological character of the church. It follows that the changes made in 1889 were not within the prohibition of this section, since they are shown to be changes in statement in the interest of clearness and completeness of declaration of belief in the doctrines actually held by the church, and which are found less fully stated in the confession prepared in 1845. The contention of the appellants upon this subject fails, therefore, for this reason. The confession of faith was not "absolutely unchangeable" in its manner of expressing the doctrines held by the church. It was unchangeable so far as relates to the distinctive doctrines or principles actually embodied in it.

We come, finally, to inquire whether the proceedings of the conference and the commission, and the expression of assent and dissent by the society, are substantially in harmony with the provision of the constitution of 1841, that authorized changes on the request of two thirds of the whole society. The exact words of the provision are: "There shall be no alteration of the foregoing constitution unless by the request of two thirds of the whole society." Alterations are not forbidden, but, as the constitution is the fundamental law of the whole society, it is proper that it should be changed only by the action or assent of the body affected by it. But there are two requirements to a lawful alteration: The action of the society, and the action of its highest church judicatory. The action of the first must be formulated and declared by the last. Which body, the popular one, described as the "society," or the ecclesiastical body, called the "General Conference," shall originate the alteration, is not prescribed. The proposition may therefore come from either. The bishops and clergy, who make up so largely the membership of the conference, are, by reason of their constant attention to religious and theological subjects and the working of the machinery of the church, peculiarly qualified to lead the thought of the church on all such subjects. It is not desirable, nor is it necessary, under the provision we are considering, that they should sit with folded hands, waiting to be addressed by the society on any subject of denominational or religious importance. They may, and it is clearly their duty to, direct attention to any given subject. They may urge its consideration and counsel speedy action, but they cannot make the change that is needed. The society must move. The word employed is "request;" but how or when, in the course of procedure, the request must be made, is not stated. It may therefore be in any manner that expresses the desire of the society, and at any time before the final act of the conference. The only thing that can be positively affirmed as to its character is that it must express the wish of the society. In the present case, action by the conference preceded and followed the expressed wish of the membership. That which proceeded suggested the desirability of certain changes, and reduced them to form for the examination and action of the society. That which followed rested on the expressed wish of the society in regard to the proposed changes, and carried it into effect. The whole society was taken into council by the conference. Its wish was asked and its answer received. The enrolled membership at that time was something over 200,000. Of this number, 51,070 signified their desire for the proposed change by an affirmative vote. Those voting against the acceptance of the revision were only 8,810. Those who preferred another mode of proceeding than that which had been taken, and petitioned the general conference accordingly, were 16,187. The total number of those who expressed themselves upon the subject was 70,567. This was more than one third of the enrolled membership. How many of those who made no response to the request of the conference for an expression of opinion were old and feeble, how many were young and immature, how many were wholly indifferent to the subject, we have no means for estimating. It is said that some refrained from voting because of objection to the proposed revision, or the mode of proceeding to ascertain the wish of the society. If so, it was an ineffectual kind of opposition. In all elections the nonvoting must be counted as willing to be bound by the action of the majority of those who vote. Any other rule would lead to interminable trouble and uncertainty. Craig v. First Presby. Church of Pittsburgh, 88 Pa. 42, 53 Am. Rep. 417. In elections under the laws of the states or the United States, this has never been doubted. In parliamentary bodies the same thing is true, unless the rules of such body require that a quorum of the membership shall participate. In that case it is a majority of the required quorum, not of the whole body, that is necessary to the validity of any proposed action. A majority consists of more than one half of those who vote at a given election not of those who might have voted, but did not vote, for we have no machinery for ascertaining the number of the latter class, and we should find it still more difficult to determine on what side they should be counted. It is true that the voting, in its case, was not done under the authority of any general law of the church, and that it is not to be treated, in all respects, as an election. It was, in its object and results, a mere expression of the individual preference, wish, or request of the voter. If any of the members of the society felt that they had no wish or request to express on the subject, it was proper for such persons to say so, by refraining from any expression in answer to the request of the general conference. But, if a positive preference was felt, it was the privilege, if not the duty, of the member entertaining such preference, to express it, for the information and guidance of the highest ecclesiastical tribunal in the society. To one looking at this subject from the standpoint of a disinterested spectator, it would really seem as though courtesy towards the growing body of the denomination, love for the church, and zeal for its prosperity and peace, alike required those who opposed revision to say so, squarely, on all suitable occasions, with voice and vote. The inference is a natural one that those who did not oppose were either favorable or indifferent to the proposed change.

Our conclusions on the whole case are as follows: This society had a constitution and a confession of faith prior to 1889 which established both the polity and the creed of the church beyond question, "so far as they were clear" and complete in expression. The general conference suggested revision of both documents, not for the introduction of new or heretical doctrine, but in the interest of clearness and fullness of declaration of the actual belief of the society, and for the removal of ambiguity and uncertainty from the written documents. The "whole society" was asked, in a regular and proper manner, to express its preference or wish upon the adoption or rejection of the revision proposed. An ample time for consideration and decision was afforded them, and a suitable system provided for gathering up the result of the wishes and preferences to be expressed. A very large majority of those who expressed any wish on the subject favored the revision proposed. In conformity with their request or wish of the society, the general conference of 1889, by proclamation made by the bishops of the church, under its direction, declared the fact that, by the concurrent action of the society and the general conference, the revised constitution and confession of faith had been adopted, and were to be accepted as the constitution and creed of the society. This general conference, and the churches adhering to it, are the Church and Society of the United Brethren in Christ, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as they were prior to 1889. Those who withdrew from the conference of 1889, and organized another conference, together with those who adhere to them, while they may be, in theological belief and religious observances, identical with the body from which they withdrew, are ecclesiastically distinct, as a result of their own acts, and they have no title to the property held by the society prior to 1889.

The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to the relief prayed for, and provided by the decree appealed from, and the decree is now affirmed; the appellants to pay the costs of this appeal.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Edmund F. WEBB, Admr., etc. of Ann S. Fuller, Deceased, et al.,
v.

(85 Me. 443.)

1. No statute is necessary to enable a court of equity to set-off the amount due by a legatee to the testator's estate against his share of the amount ordered to be distributed by the court of probate.
2. Neither the fact that a debt due by legatees to testator's estate is joint nor that one of them is dead and his legacy is claimed by his administrator will prevent the amount of their debt being retained from their claims to legacies.
3. A legatee who necessitates a resort to litigation to compel him to permit a set-off of his debt to testator's estate against his legacy cannot have his costs paid out of the estate.

(May 31, 1893.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Kennebec County for the opinion of the full court of a bill in equity filed by the administrator of the estate of Ann S. Fuller, deceased, to compel the applications of the shares of defendants as distributees of decedent's estate to the payment of judgments which had been obtained against them by the administrator in favor of the estate. Bill sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Webb, Johnson & Webb for plaintiffs.

Mr. W. P. Thompson for defendants.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ann S. Fuller died intestate, leaving an estate to be divided after settlement into four distributive shares. Two of the heirs, to each of whom one share was payable, were jointly indebted to the estate. The administrator recovered upon this indebtedness a judgment against the two heirs. He was not able to collect the whole amount of this judgment, nearly $25,000 remaining unpaid and uncollectible. He settled the estate as far as he could without the balance of the judgment, and the probate court made a decree for a distribution among the heirs of the balance in his hands, amounting to a little over $18,000.

The administrator desired to apply to the further payment of this judgment the share of each judgment debtor in the balance to be thus distributed. To this each of the judgment debtors objected, and formally demanded that his distributive share be paid to him in full in accordance with the decree. Thereupon the administrator filed this bill in equity to compel the application of these two shares to the payment pro tanto of the joint judgments.

The respondents contend that the right of set-off is solely and entirely a creation of the statute, and hence cannot be exercised in any case unless some statute expressly authorizes it. They further contend that the statute gives the probate court no authority to make such a set-off as is desired here; and that in no case and in no proceeding does the statute authorize a set-off of one joint debt against two several debts, as asked for in this case. Rev. Stat. chap. 82, § 57.

NORM.—On the subject of set-off between a distributive share of an estate and a debt of the distributee to the estate, see, in connection with the above case, that of Koons v. Mellett (Ind.) 7 L. 23 L. R. A.

It may be conceded that no statute can be cited directly authorizing the action asked for in this case, but it does not follow that the court in equity is without power of action in the premises. Having now full equity powers, the court can do and compel equity in any case except where restrained by some statute or positive rule of law.

The right of an executor or administrator to retain a legacy or distributive share from a debtor to the estate, and apply it to the indebtedness, has long been recognized by the law as existing without any statute. It is not the technical right of set-off in actions at law. It is rather called in the old cases the "right of retainer." It is an equitable right of its own nature, and not at all dependent upon any statute. It is the plain moral, as well as legal, duty of the debtor to pay his debt to the estate. He has had the value from the estate. He ought in morals and law to restore it. It needs no statute to affirm this duty. It is self-evident.

The right of a legatee or an heir in the estate of a decedent is not self-evident nor equitable. He has paid no value for it,—has not earned it. It is a matter of grace. To make it a legal right needs statute affirmation, and without a statute or some positive rule of law the right would not exist. That the legatee or heir should fulfill his obligations to the estate before receiving the bounty of the decedent is clearly equitable. It is an equity which the court can enforce.

In Jeffer v. Wood, 2 P. Wms. 128 (temp. 1695), the court said: "The legatee's claim is in respect of the testator's assets, without which the executor is not liable; and it is very just and equitable for the executor to say that the legatee has so much of the assets already in his own hands, and consequently is satisfied pro tanto." In Courtenay v. Williams, 3 Hare, 539, a legatee filed a bill to compel the executor to pay over a legacy. The executor claimed to retain out of the legacy the amount of a debt owed by the legatee to the estate. The legatee resisted this claim on the ground that his indebtedness was barred by the statute of limitations. It was held, however, to be equitable to deduct the debt from the legacy notwithstanding the statute. The court said the case might be put to the legatee as follows: "You ask for a portion of the assets of the testator; but you are yourself a debtor to the testator's estate, and his assets are diminished pro tanto by your default. It is against conscience that you should take anything out of the estate until you have made good what you owe to it." In White v. Cordwell, L. R. 20 Eq. 644, the same principle was applied in an intestate estate between the administrator and an indebted heir. The court said: "Until the debtor discharges his duty to the estate by paying his debt which he owes to it, he can have no right or title to any part of it under the statute" (the statute of distributions). In Batton v. Allen, 5 N. J. Eq. 99, 43 Am. Dec. 630, one of the seven distributees was indebted to the estate. It was held that the amount of his indebtedness should be added to the surplus, and form a part of the amount to be divided; that the debtor's share of the whole amount should be paid pro tanto by canceling his indebtedness, and he receive only the residue of his share, if any. Armour v. Kendall, 15 R. I. 193, was a case of joint indebtedness like the one before us. A legatee and another party were jointly indebted to the estate of the testator. It was held that the executor could retain the legacy as a pro tanto payment of the debt due by the legatee and his partner to the estate. In Tinkham v. Smith, 56 Vt. 187, the heir brought an action at law against the administrator for his distributive share of the decedent's estate as determined by the probate court. He was at the same time indebted to the estate in a larger sum. It was held that the administrator could apply the indebtedness in payment of the share, and judgment was rendered for the defendant. It appears, however, in this case, that one of the two indebted heirs died after the recovery of the judgment against him and his coheir. This administratrix now contends that she is entitled to his share in Ann S. Fuller's estate in full to enable her to settle his estate. It must be evident, however, that the heirs, creditors, or administrator of a deceased legatee or distributee can be in no better position than he, and must be content with the residue, if any, after his debt to the estate is paid. It was so held in Denise v. Denise, 87 N. J. Eq. 163; Earnest v. Earnest, 5 Rawle, 218; Girard Life Ins. A. & T. Co. v. Wilson, 57 Pa. 182.

In Wadleigh v. Jordan, 74 Me. 488, and Holt v. Libby, 80 Me. 329, the statute of limitations had barred the debt of the legatee to the estate, and it was held that under our statutes the executor could not apply the legacy in payment of a debt so barred. Neither case, however, questions the power or propriety of such application where the debt is not barred.

In this case there should be a decree substantially as follows: The amount due on the judgment should be added to the amount of the surplus in the hands of the administrator, and the sum of these should be reckoned as the amount for distribution. The two shares of this whole amount coming to the two indebted distributees should be applied to the payment of the judgment against them. The other two shares should be paid, as far as the cash balance extends, to the other distributees according to their respective interests. It is asked in the briefs that the court order costs and counsel fees for both parties to be paid out of the estate. We do not think it would be equitable to do so. It is not the case of a will or a trust. The case is purely litigious. The two indebted distributees and defendants resisted an equitable right of the plaintiff, and subjected the estate to this litigation by their recalcitrancy. While the plaintiff should be allowed to deduct his costs and reasonable counsel fees from the balance in his hands after accounting for taxable costs recovered, we see no reason why the two contesting defendants, who are found to be in the wrong, should not pay costs as usual. The decree will so order.

Bill sustained.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

Mary Mildred JOHNSON, Executrix, etc., of John Cummings Johnson, Deceased, et al., Piffs. in Err.,

v.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A devise of land to trustees with power to collect the income for charitable purposes, giving them power to appoint their successors and providing against failure of trustees indefinitely, passes the fee, if the devise is valid.
2. A devise to trustees "for some charitable purpose, preference always to be given to something of an educational nature, although permissible to appropriate the income in any way it may seem to the trustees to be necessary and most desirable as they may elect," is too indefinite to be enforced in equity.
3. A bequest of testator's set of books "and the proceeds of all collections he can make from accounts which were the results of my past oil and cotton business. The accounts against or in favor of" certain of testator's relatives, "as well as accounts of properties, rents, stocks, bonds, and investments to be treated as memorandums only and not to be included in the above bequest," does not pass the accounts against the relatives.

(May 16, 1893.)

ERROR to the Chancery Court for Shelby County to review a judgment holding void a portion of the will of John Cummings Johnson, deceased, for the construction of which this action was brought. Affirmed.

The portions of the will, the construction of which by the lower court was adopted by the court on appeal were as follows:

"Clause 8. I give and bequeath to my son, William C. Johnson, my largest iron safe, my set of books, and the proceeds of all collections he can make from accounts which were the results of my past oil and cotton business, with full power to continue suits, to sue or compromise any accounts therein, with freedom from making any report of his action to any person or any authority, state, county, municipal, or otherwise. The accounts against or in favor of Mrs. J. C. Johnson, Mrs. M. M. Johnson, J. C. Johnson, or any of my descendants, as well as accounts of properties. Rents, stocks, bonds, and investments to be treated as memorandums only, and not to be included in the above bequeath."

"Clause 24. The income from the rentals and rental notes now in bank, and proceeds of Chapman notes, will be used by my wife, Mary Mildred Johnson, for family expenses, as now and heretofore."

The construction given to the above clauses was as follows: "First. That by the eighth item or clause of said will the testator intended to give and bequeath, and did give and bequeath, to William C. Johnson, all accounts, of every kind, nature, and description, that appeared on his set of books, whether said accounts were the result of his past oil and cotton businesses or not, save and except only the accounts appearing on said set of books against or in favor of Mrs. J. C. Johnson, Mrs. Mary Mildred Johnson, J. C. Johnson, or any of testator's descendants, as well as accounts therein of properties, rents, stock, bonds, and investments, all of which excepted accounts are to be treated simply as memorandums, and are not included in the said bequest to the said William C. Johnson. . . . That by the twenty-fourth item or clause of said will the said testator intended to give and bequeath, and does give and bequeath, to his wife, Mary Mildred Johnson, to be used by her in the payment of family expenses in the same manner as before testator's death, such moneys in bank at the time of his death as had been derived from rentals, and such rental notes as were in bank at the time of his death, still uncollected, together with the proceeds of the Chapman notes, as aforesaid, and that outside of the rents given to Mrs. Johnson under the fourteenth and fifteenth items or clauses of said will, which last rentals are given to her absolutely, to be disposed of at her pleasure, she can appropriate no other rentals or properties of the testator's estate to the payment of the family expenses."

Mr. H. C. Warrinner for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Smith & Tresevant for defendants in error.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill to construe the several items of the will of John Cummings Johnson, deceased. The testator died July 25, 1892, leaving a widow, complainant Mary Mildred

NOTE.—As to the indefiniteness of charitable trusts which will be fatal, which has been a question of very great public as well as professional interest in several recent cases, see Crerar v. Williams (Ill.) 21 L. R. A. 454; Tilden v. Green (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 23 L. R. A.

Johnson, and seven children by a former marriage, and possessed of quite a large estate, of both realty and personalty. The will was written by the testator, and is somewhat artificially drawn. It consists of twenty-six items, and purports to convey and dispose of all the property of the testator. The several items submitted to the chancellor were construed by him, and specific directions were entered in the decree, and a written opinion was filed by him in the court below. The cause has been brought to this court upon writ of error, and it is assigned as error that the chancellor erred in his construction of the eighth, seventeenth, and twenty-fourth items of the will. We have carefully considered these items, and the assignment, and are of opinion that there is no error in the construction placed by the chancellor upon the eighth and twenty-fourth items of the will, and his opinion and decree as to these items are adopted by this court, and need not be more specifically set out.

The main controversy is in regard to the proper construction of the seventeenth item, which is as follows: "17th. I give and bequeath to my wife, Mary Mildred Johnson, and to my daughter, Lillie W. Johnson, jointly, my home lot, of three acres, No. 11, fronting on Poplar street, east of Dunlap, to hold in trust as below cited, with power to lease and sell the same under the terms of this will, and to nominate and elect their successors and other associates in this trust from my descendants, or from their Protestant husbands or wives, not exceeding five, who may in time elect their associates and successors from my descendants. If at any time in the future there should not be as many as two of my descendants able and willing to take charge of this trust, then it shall revert to a board consisting of the elders of the several Presbyterian churches of the city of Memphis, who shall, with the assistance of the Presbyterian pastors, nominate from the bankers or business men of their body an executive committee of five, who, with my descendants, shall have full power and control to manage the trust so it will be productive of most good to the greatest number. It has been my desire to see a grand female college on this lot, and I hope it may yet be accomplished. If the way be clear to that end, the income may be appropriated in that direction; but, if not, then it is my desire and wish that the main income from this property, less the amount needed for repairs, taxes, and insurance, shall be used for some charitable purpose, preference always to be given to something of an educational nature, although permissible to appropriate the income in any way it may seem to the trustees to be necessary and most desirable, as they may elect. The property is never to be mortgaged, nor is the income to be pledged for more than three months in advance, and no sale of it shall be made until five years after the termination of the present lease, when it may be sold for reinvestment for some scholastic or charitable purpose."

The question presented is whether this is a valid devise to a charitable purpose, such as can be upheld under our authorities. The complainants, who are the executors of the testator's will, are also made by this item the original trustees of this charity; and in their bill they allege that the item made a valid devise to them, as trustees, of the property, in fee; the net rents and income to be applied to charitable purposes, which are rendered sufficiently definite to be valid. The adult defendants answer that they have no desire to obstruct the benevolent and charitable intentions of their father, if they can be legally carried out, and they join in the request to the court to construe the item, and determine, as against the minor defendants and devisees, if effect can be given to the devise as a valid charity.

We are of opinion that, if the devise is valid, then the item passes the fee in the property for the purposes indicated, the net income from which is to be expended and appropriated by the trustees. While there is no specific devise of the property, yet a devise of the rents and profits and income is, in effect, a devise of the property itself. Polk v. Paris, 9 Yerg. 241, 80 Am. Dec. 400; Morgan v. Pope, 7 Coldw. 547; Davis v. Williams, 85 Tenn. 648; Pilcher v. McHenry, 14 Lea, 88; 1 Jarman, Wills, 152, note; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 529, 580; Spofford v. College (Jan., 1889). In the case last mentioned, Thomas Martin, of Giles county, had set apart $80,000 in bonds of the state of Tennessee, the interest to be applied to the founding and operating a female school at Pulaski, Tenn. After the school had been founded, and successfully operated for a number of years, Mrs. O. M. Spofford, his only daughter and residuary legatee, filed a bill claiming that only the interest upon the bonds was devoted by the will of her father to the school, and that when the bonds matured, and the interest coupons had all been clipped and exhausted, then the bonds or corpus of the fund would revert to her, as residuary legatee under the will. The court below, as well as this court, held that the gift of the interest of the bonds carried the bonds themselves, and the fund could not be diverted from the charity.

But the question in this case recurs: Is the devise, as made in the seventeenth item of the will, a valid devise for charitable uses? Charitable uses are favored in courts of equity, and will be supported when the trust would fail for uncertainty, were it not for a charity. Dickson v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 848; Heiskell v. Chickasaw Lodge No. 8, 87 Tenn. 668, 4 L. R. A. 699. This court has no disposition to abridge this rule, or recede from it, in any way. A charity will always be upheld, where it is created in favor of a person having sufficient capacity to take as donee, or, if it be not direct to such person, where it is definite in its object, lawful in its creation, and to be executed by trustees. Franklin v. Armfield, 2 Sneed, 805; Gass v. Ross, 3 Sneed, 211; Cobb v. Denton, 6 Baxt. 285; Frierson v. General Assembly of Presby. Church in U. S. 7 Heisk. 688; Dickson v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 848. There is a broad distinction between a gift direct to a charity or charitable institutions already established, and a gift to a trustee, to be by him applied to a charity. In the first case the court has only to give the fund to the charitable institution, which is merely a ministerial or prerogative act; but in the latter case the court has jurisdiction of the trustee, as it has over all trustees, to see that he does not commit a breach of his trust, or apply the funds, in bad faith, to purposes foreign to the charity. 2 Perry, Tr. § 719. Hence, there must be either (1) a trustee capable of taking, and a definite legal purpose declared; (2) a trust so definite and well defined that it can be enforced and executed, if necessary, by a court of chancery.

The chancellor was of opinion that provisions of the will providing for trustees of this charity were sufficient, and in this we think he is well sustained by authority. An executor may be such trustee (Cobb v. Denton, 6 Baxt. 236; Gass v. Ross, 8 Sneed, 211), or third persons may be such trustees (Dickson v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 348; Franklin v. Armfield, 2 Sneed, 346; State v. Smith, 16 Lea, 665), or the court may appoint a trustee, if the trusts are definite and valid (State v. Smith, 16 Lea, 665; Vidal v. Philadelphia, 48 U. S. 2 How. 127, 128, 11 L. ed. 205, 206; Perry, Tr. § 722), or a corporation to be created after the death of the testator may be such trustee. Inglis v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor of N. Y. 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 99, 7 L. ed. 617; Ould v. Washington Hospital for Foundlings, 95 U. S. 803, 24 L. ed. 450; Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 173, 27 L. ed. 401; State v. Martin Female College [Tenn.; filed Jan. 1888.] The real difficulty in the devise is the uncertainty of the beneficiary, and the extreme discretion and power vested in the trustee. Unquestionably, under the English law, and the law relating to charitable trusts prevailing in many states of our Union which have adopted the doctrines of the English law, this trust would be good. The doctrines of parens patriæ and cy pres, as recognized in the English law, have never obtained in Tennessee. Only those powers which in England were exercised by the chancellor by virtue of his extraordinary, as distinguished from his specially delegated, jurisdiction, exist in our chancery court. Green v. Allen, 5 Humph. 170; Dickson v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 348. Nevertheless, the courts will sustain a charity when the plan and scheme for its management is left to the discretion of trustees, and will, if necessary, formulate a scheme for the conduct of the charity, or uphold the plan and schemes which the trustees, in their discretion, many adopt and formulate, and prevent any interference therewith. State v. Smith, 16 Lea, 670; Perry, Tr. §§ 700, 744; Dickson v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 348; Gass v. Ross, 8 Sneed, 211; State v. Martin Female College (Tenn.; filed Jan. 1888). In the case last named a bill was filed in the name of the state of Tennessee, on the relation of the Reverend T. J. Duncan, a presiding elder in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, against the trustees of Martin Female College, an educational charity in successful operation at Pulaski, Tenn., seeking to set aside the charter of the college, remove its trustees from office, and enjoin the operation of the school, because it had been founded by Thomas Martin, a prominent Methodist layman, and for years had been recognized and patronized by the Tennessee conference, and yet the trustees had not conducted it as a sectarian or denominational school, but had placed in charge of it principals of different tenets of faith. The court held that, in the absence of specific instructions in the will of Thomas Martin, the trustees had the power and discretion to place in charge of it such persons as they might deem best, and their discretion could not be controlled by any other persons or organizations.

In the case at bar we have a specific, definite property designated and set apart by the testator, and conveyed to trustees whose identity is fixed, and whose succession is provided for. It is apparent, also, that it was the earnest desire of the testator to devote this property to charitable purposes, and to none other, the principal or corpus to be preserved, and the income to be consumed for the purpose of the charity, and in such manner as might be productive of the greatest good to the greatest number. We think it is also evident that the testator had a primary and a secondary object, the former being to found a charity, and the latter being that, as a matter of preference, the charity should be educational. It is evident, also, that the testator had the utmost confidence in the trustees selected, to wit, his wife and daughter, and he gave to them unlimited power and discretion, not only as to the kind or character of the charity, but also as to the plan for its administration. In all cases of charities founded by wills, broad discretion and ample powers must necessarily be conferred upon the trustees, inasmuch as the testator is attempting to provide for contingencies which will arise after his own death; but at the same time this power and discretion must not go to such extent as that the objects to which the fund is to be devoted, and the kind and character of the charity, will depend, not upon the will and direction of the testator, but upon the choice and preference of the trustee. In Read v. Williams, 125 N. Y. 569, it is said: "That cannot well be said to be a disposition by the testator's will, with which the testator has had nothing to do, except to create an authority in another to dispose of the property according to the will of the donees of the power."

The important question which primarily arises is whether the object of the trust, and who are to be its beneficiaries, depend upon the will of the testator, or the choice of the trustee, and is there any one who could demand of the trustee the benefits of the trust, because it was made for his benefit, and others of his class, and if refused, could compel its performance. In the case of Tilden v. Green, 130 N. Y. 29, 14 L. R. A. 88, the devise in trust under the thirty-fifth and thirty-ninth items of the will of Samuel J. Tilden was passed upon. Under these items, property was devised to trustees to be held for two lives in being, with requests that they procure an act of incorporation, to be known as the "Tilden Trust," with capacity to establish and maintain a free library and reading room in the city of New York, and to promote such scientific and educational objects as the trustees might more particularly designate, and authorized them to convey such property to such corporation when formed, and declared that in case it was not formed, or if, from any cause or reason, they should deem it inexpedient to convey to such corporation, then they were directed to apply it to the use of such charitable, educational, or scientific purposes as in their judgment would render such property most widely and substantially beneficial to the interests of mankind. It was said in that case: "The devise does not designate any beneficiary, but, on the contrary, leaves it to the discretion of the trustees whether or not they will or will not convey to the corporation. Hence, there is not, and cannot be, any person, natural or artificial, who is, or will become, entitled to the execution of the trust in his favor." The conclusion of the court was that the bequest could not be maintained because of the complete discretion vested in the trustees,—whether they would give it, or not, to the beneficiary suggested. A charter was actually obtained, and the property was in fact conveyed by the trustees to the corporation thus created, before the suit was brought; but the court held that the invalidity of the trust could not be cured by anything done by the trustees towards its execution. It is also held in that case that a trust without a beneficiary who can claim its enforcement is void, and this objection is not obviated by the existence in the trustees of a power to select a beneficiary, unless the class of persons in whose favor the power may be exercised has been designated with such certainty that the court can ascertain who were the objects of the power, and, when the beneficiary is not designated in the will, such beneficiary cannot be designated by the trustees in pursuance of a discretion vested in them by the will. It is further said: "No trust is enforceable unless there is some person or class of persons who have a right to a part or all of the designated fund, and can demand its conveyance to them, and, in case of refusal, can sue the trustees in equity, and compel compliance with the demand."

In the case at bar the power and discretion vested in the trustees are more extensive than in the Tilden Will Case. Here there is a mere preference expressed for an educational charity by the testator, and a hope that a grand female college may at some time be located on the lot; but absolute power is given to the trustees, at their discretion, to divert the property to any other charitable purpose, even over the preference of the testator himself, as expressed in his will. Under this power and discretion the trustees might at will devote the property to any charity, whether educational, religious, or eleemosynary, and they could at will change and alter the discretion in which the charity should flow. Under this broad discretion and power, the trustees might, instead of a female school, establish a public library or a lecture room, or a church or woman's home, or any other charity; and, if either of these should be selected by these trustees as the object of this devise, certainly it could not be said they had exceeded their powers and discretion, and, if either should be established, it would not be because of directions in the will of the testator, but from choice and preference on the part of the trustees. We are constrained to hold that such a charitable devise cannot be enforced, and is invalid. Reeves v. Reeves, 5 Lea, 644; Rhodes v. Rhodes, 88 Tenn. 637. The chancellor decreed that the devise must fail, and the property must pass under the nineteenth clause, which he construed to be the residuary clause of the will. As no point or contest is made upon this part of his decree, we are content to affirm his holding on this point. See also Reeves v. Reeves, 5 Lea, 650.

The decree of the chancellor is in all things confirmed, and the costs will be paid by complainants out of the estate.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Charles MILLER, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(139 N. Y. 33.)

1. An undertaking establishment in which human dead bodies are prepared for burial or other sepulture, and sometimes subjected to embalming and post-mortem examination, is a business "injurious or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants," within the terms of a restrictive agreement, although it may not constitute a legal nuisance.

2. Courts can take judicial notice of the offensive character of an undertaking establishment in a locality used for residences.

3. The fact that most of the premises in the locality are no longer kept for residences will not deprive a person who still resides there and who has done or omitted nothing which would defeat it of the right to enforce a restriction in an agreement against business "injurious or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants."

judgment of the Special Term enjoining defendants from violating a restrictive clause in the title papers to his real estate as to the use to which it could be put. Affirmed.

Statement by Earl, J.:

In November, 1865, Miss Burr owned several lots of land in the city of New York, on the easterly side of Madison avenue, extending easterly to Vanderbilt avenue, between Forty-Second and Forty-Fourth streets, all of which were then vacant, and on the 20th day of that month she contracted to sell eight of the lots to Pierson and Cochran. Those lots extended southerly from the southerly line of Forty-Third street half way to the northerly line of Forty-Second street. She still retained title to several lots in the same vicinity, and on the same day she and they entered into a mutual agreement, "for themselves and their representatives, heirs and assigns, owners of any of the said lots above described, that no buildings other than dwelling houses at least two stories high, of brick or stone, or churches, chapels, or private stables of the same material, shall be erected on any of said lots; that no livery or other stable shall be erected on lots fronting on Madison avenue; and that there shall not be allowed or erected on any part of said lots of land any tenement house, brewery, or lager-beer saloon, tavern, slaughter house, butcher's or smith's shop, forge, furnace, steam engine, foundry, carpenter's or carriage or car shop, manufactory of metals, gunpowder, glue, varnish, vitriol, turpentine, ink, or matches, or any distillery, or any establishment for dressing hides, skins, or leather, or any museum, theater, circus, or menagerie, nor shall any other buildings be erected, or trade or business carried on, upon said lots, which shall be injurious or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants; it being expressly agreed that this covenant runs with the land, and is binding on all future owners thereof." This agreement is called the "Restriction Agreement," and the lots have since been conveyed subject thereto. The defendant Miller has become the owner of the lot on the corner of Madison avenue and Forty-Third street, and the plaintiff owns the lot next southerly thereof, which she occupies as her residence; and no question is made that those lots passed into the ownership of the plaintiff and Miller subject to the restriction agreement. On the 1st day of December, 1890, Miller leased his lot, with the house thereon, to the Taylor Company, for the term of ten years, and it entered into the possession thereof. This action was commenced on the 31st day of January, 1891, to restrain the defendants from violating the covenants contained in the restriction agreement, by carrying on a business condemned thereby. The action was brought to trial at a special term, and the trial judge described the business carried on upon the Miller lot as follows: "That the business of said company is, and for many years has been, that of undertakers, and that a part of that business consists in the reception of human dead bodies, their preparation for burial or other sepulture, involving embalment in some instances, and in the sale of coffins, caskets, shrouds, and other paraphernalia generally used in the final disposition of dead human bodies. That said company, when it obtained said lease, intended to fit up the building on said premises, which for the most part is built and arranged like an ordinary first-class corner dwelling house in that locality, for the purposes of their business, and have fitted up the same, and are now carrying on their said business in said building. That said company keeps and uses fourteen wagons in its business, each of which (save one) is painted and otherwise fitted up after the manner of wagons used by undertakers in transporting dead human bodies or funeral appliances. That it has fitted up a room in said building called by said company a 'chapel,' and intended by it for the use of people who desire to conduct or hold funeral services, and not for religious worship or services, except so far as such worship or services may be incidental to such funeral ceremonies, which use of said chapel is a part of the business of the said company, and from which it expects and intends to make money. That said company has also fitted up the front basement of said building (which hitherto was like the front basement of an ordinary dwelling in that locality) with special reference to, and for the special purpose of, holding autopsies upon, and for the dissection and other post-mortem examination of, dead human bodies, having prepared a marble table for that special purpose, and closed up the windows and other means of looking into their said autopsy room, in order to prevent observation of idle or curious people, who might otherwise be tempted to congregate about and look into the basement windows while dead human bodies were undergoing such dissection or examination. That in order to prevent the escape into other parts of said building of the foul and noxious odors and gases which usually escape from dead human bodies during autopsical or other post-mortem examinations, said company have opened ventilating holes from said dissection room into two chimney flues, and placed gas jets in said flues, in the hope and expectation that such gases and odors would escape from said building into the air above said building by means of such chimney flues; but they have taken no other precaution to prevent the spread of such odors and gases after their expected escape from the chimney flues. That a part of the undertaking business consists in the receipt and temporary storage of dead human bodies, and in affording facilities for autopsical or other post-mortem examinations upon such bodies whenever it is desired or required. That the parlor floors of said building have been elegantly fitted up for funeral purposes, and are designed by said company for that use, not as a matter of charity, but as a matter of business, and for business profit. That said company have extensively advertised their said business, and the use which they propose to make and are making of said building, and that they will furnish professional embalmers, and that their premises will be kept open day and night for the purposes of their business, by means of advertisements in newspapers which circulate mainly among undertakers, and by means of circulars addressed to the members of the medical profession generally in New York city and vicinity, in which they offer the use of the said dissecting room and other autopsical facilities free of charge. That already there have been several funerals held at said company's said rooms; one of them, a Chinese funeral. That already there have been held several autopsies and post-mortem examinations of dead human bodies in said dissecting rooms, and it is the hope and expectation of the said company to increase the use of their said premises for the foregoing purposes, as a matter of business in order to make money"—and he found that the carrying on of such business was a violation of the restriction agreement, and he ordered judgment restraining it. 15 N. Y. Supp. 701.

The sixth clause of the judgment is as follows: "Sixth. The action having been tried by the parties on the theory that it involved the question whether the combination of purposes (the one associated with and depending on the other) to which the Taylor Company devoted the building occupied by it under the lease from the defendant Miller violated the covenants aforesaid, and the defendants having made no claim that any one particular use was exempt from the operation of the covenants, it is ordered that upon payment of the costs awarded, and proof that the combination of purposes has ceased, and the use of the premises for the business of holding autopsies or other post-mortem examinations, dissecting, receiving, and storing of dead bodies, and the use of said premises for the business of having funerals therefrom, has been abandoned, the said defendants may at any time apply to the court, on notice, to modify the injunction so as to permit the lessees to run the office and parlors connected with said premises, to solicit orders and sell coffins by sample in the wareroom, and to use the room called a 'chapel' for the legitimate purposes of a chapel,—that is, as a place of worship,—all within such limitations as may be necessary to preserve the integrity of the covenants, and not offend its spirit and purpose."

Subsequent to the rendition of the judgment, the Taylor Company having complied with that clause, and shown that the business complained of by the plaintiff had ceased, upon its application to the court the following order was made: "Ordered, that the injunction contained in the said judgment or decree be, and the same hereby is, modified, in compliance with the provisions of the sixth paragraph of the said judgment or decree, so as to permit the said defendant the Taylor Company, the lessees of the premises mentioned and described in the said judgment or decree, and the said lessees are hereby permitted, to run the office and parlors connected with said premises to solicit orders and sell coffins by sample in the wareroom, and to use the room called a 'chapel' for the legitimate purposes of a chapel,—that is, as a place of worship,—so long as such uses do not impair the integrity of the covenants contained in the restriction agreement in said judgment or decree more particularly referred to, and so as not to offend the spirit and purposes of the said covenants, or of the said restriction agreement, without prejudice to the right of said plaintiff to apply to the court to prevent or punish any abuses of said injunction as thus modified." The defendant Miller alone appealed from the judgment to the general term, where it was affirmed (18 N. Y. Supp. 798), and then he appealed to this court.

Messrs. George Zabriskie and J. E. Burrill, for appellant:

The facts were on the principle of adjudicated cases insufficient to prove that the business of the Taylor Company was per se or in the mode in which it was considered "injurious and offensive" so as to sustain a judgment enjoining the carrying on of said business.

If there was anything in the method in which the business was carried on to render it offensive or injurious and entitle the plaintiff to an injunction, such injunction should have been limited so as to restrain the carrying on the business in a manner calculated to be offensive or injurious.

There was nothing to show that the business of the Taylor Company created offensive odors, or that the air was affected by any disagreeable or offensive smells emanating from the premises in question, or that such business produced a tangible and appreciable injury to the neighboring property, or rendered its enjoyment specially uncomfortable or inconvenient.

Campbell v. Seaman, 68 N. Y. 576, 20 Am. Rep. 567; Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas Light Co. 9 L. R. A. 711, 123 N. Y. 28.

The character of a business or use is to be judged by an ordinary and reasonable standard, not merely according to elegant or dainty modes and habits of living, but according to plain, sober, and simple notions among the people.

Walter v. Selfe, supra; Pollock, Torts, 381.

The trades or occupations which the law regards as injurious or offensive are those which produce physical discomfort, and not those which are merely disagreeable or displease the eye or offend the taste or shock an oversensitive or fastidious nature, or cause unpleasant reflections, no matter how irritating or unpleasant.

Demarest v. Hardham, 84 N. J. Eq. 469; Cleveland v. Citizens Gas Light Co. 20 N. J. Eq. 201; Barnes v. Hathorn, 54 Me. 124; Monk v. Packard, 71 Me. 309, 86 Am. Rep. 815; *Musgrove v. Neither does the law consider as injurious or offensive those trades or occupations which one person or another may be found to dislike, but only those things which are offensive and injurious to reasonable and plain people, everywhere.

St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L.

Cas. 642, 4 Best & S. 1093; Walter v. Selfe, 4 DeG. & Sm. 822.

In Westcott v. Middleton, 48 N. J. Eq. 478, affirmed by 44 N. J. Eq. 297, it was held: (1) That the onus of showing that an "undertaker's establishment in which he keeps coffins, ice boxes, and cases in which he preserves the bodies of the dead, and in the rear of which he cleaves and dries such boxes" is a nuisance is on the complainant; (2) that the business of an undertaker, though carried on in the populous part of a city, is not in law injurious or offensive to the neighbors, even though exciting in them feelings of deep repugnance and disgust; (3) that the only kind of discomfort of which a court can take judicial cognizance is physical, and not such as depends on taste or imagination, and that only those things will be restrained which are offensive physically to the senses and thereby make life uncomfortable.

See Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Angel, 41 N. J. Eq. 816, 56 Am. Rep. 1.

Where no physical injury is shown, tombs, cemeteries, graveyards, and private burial plots, though in close proximity to dwellings, and though they excite the utmost repugnance in the minds of those who inhabit the neighboring houses, and fill them with unhappy reflections, are not in point of law injurious or offensive.

Barnes v. Hathorn, 54 Me. 124; Mont v. Packard, 71 Me. 309, 36 Am. Rep. 815; Musgrove v. St. Louis Catholic Church, 10 La. Ann. 431; Ellison v. Washington Cemrs. 58 N. C. 57, 75 Am. Dec. 480.

If the rule as laid down in the present case were correct the lawfulness of every man's business would depend upon no rule but the condition of his neighbor's sensibilities or tastes.

This would not be law at all but anarchy.

If the dislike of neighbors can in any case affect the question, it must be a reasonable dislike based upon physical discomfort, according to plain, sober, and simple notions among the American people.

Walter v. Selfe, 4 DeG. & Sm. 822; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 27 L. ed. 739.

When the injury complained of is to property, mere diminution in value is insufficient (Wood, Nuisances, § 8), but there must be "tangible" or as some cases hold "appreciable injury" to property, and such injury must also be substantial and of appreciable magnitude, and be apparent to persons of common intelligence.

The restriction agreement is in reality a covenant against nuisances, and nothing more, and does not bind the owner of the land any further than he would be bound by the law in the absence of any covenant.

The expressions used, "injurious and offensive," are the same which are used in defining a nuisance, and in the absence of any covenant the law imposes a duty on the owner of the premises not to use them so as to be injurious or offensive.

Pickard v. Collins, 38 Barb. 444.

In view of the uncontradicted evidence that the character of the neighborhood had been changed, and that it had been converted from a locality of first-class residences into a locality of miscellaneous business, the plaintiff was not entitled to any equitable relief.

On questions of specific performance courts of equity are not limited to the language of the covenant itself, but are bound to consider the circumstances of the case with the view to ascertain whether the situation of the parties and of the premises is such that justice would be promoted by enforcing the covenant and may exercise their discretion as to its enforcement.

Conger v. New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 29; Fitzpatrick v. Dorland, 27 Hun, 391.

Messrs. Lockwood & Hill, for respondents:

The appellant's contention that this restriction is the simple equivalent of a restriction against nuisances cannot be sustained.

The purpose of this restriction was to preserve this property for residence purposes. Its design was to exclude special trades, business, and buildings, and all other trades, business, and buildings which should be injurious or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants;—a term which necessarily refers to the people who resided—who lived and made their homes—in houses in the neighborhood.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The main contention of the parties is over the meaning and force of the restriction agreement. The claim of the appellant that it simply restrains nuisances cannot be sustained, and hence the numerous authorities cited by his counsel on the argument before us have little or no application. If the agreement was intended simply to restrain any trade or business which was per se a nuisance, or which was carried on in such a way as to make it a nuisance, then it was wholly unnecessary. The law will always, upon the application of a party aggrieved, restrain and abate a private nuisance. This case is not governed by the general law as to nuisances, but by the force and effect of the covenants contained in the agreement. When the agreement was made, the parties thereto, desiring to improve, protect, and benefit their lots, and consulting their respective interests, absolutely prohibited the carrying on of certain kinds of business specified upon the lots. They determined for themselves that those kinds of business were undesirable in the vicinity of residences, and covenants restraining them can be enforced without any proof whatever that they are "injurious or offensive." A person owning a body of land, and selling a portion thereof, may, for the benefit of his remaining land, impose any restrictions, not against public policy, upon the land granted, he sees fit, and a court of equity will generally enforce them. Trustees of Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 440; Trustees of Columbia College v. Thacher, 87 N. Y. 311, 41 Am. Rep. 365; Hodge v. Sloan, 107 N. Y. 244.

The business carried on by the Taylor Company is not among those kinds particularly specified in the agreement. But the claim of the plaintiff is that it is prohibited by the general clause in the agreement, as "injurious or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants." This clause enlarges the scope of the agreement. It is a too narrow construction to hold that it prohibits only trades or kinds of business which are nuisances per se for reasons already given, and for the further reason that nearly, if not quite, all the trades and business specially named are not such nuisances. Any kind of business may become a nuisance by the manner in which it is carried on from its location, and a business may be offensive to neighboring inhabitants, and yet fall far short of being a legal nuisance, which a court of equity will abate as such. This clause in the agreement must have a reasonable construction. We cannot suppose that the parties had in mind any business which might be offensive to a person of a supersensitive organization, or to one of a peculiar and abnormal temperament, or to the small class of persons who are generally annoyed by sights, sounds, and objects not offensive to other people. They undoubtedly had in mind ordinary, normal people, and meant to prohibit trades and business which would be offensive to people generally, and would thus render the neighborhood to such people undesirable as a place of residence. It cannot be doubted that the business of the Taylor Company was, within this definition, offensive to the neighboring residents. People of ordinary sensibilities would not willingly live next to a lot upon which such a business is carried on. An ordinary person, desiring to rent such a house as plaintiff's, would not take her house, if he could get one just like it, at the same rent, at some other suitable and convenient place. Indeed, her house would be shunned by people generally who could afford to live in such an expensive house. The courts can take judicial notice of the offensive character of such a business. Judges must be supposed to be acquainted with the ordinary sentiments, feelings, and sensibilities of the people among whom they live; and hence, in this case, the learned judge, after the character of the business carried on by the Taylor Company had been proved, could have found, as matter of law, that it was in violation of the restriction agreement, without any further proof. It was therefore unnecessary for the plaintiff, upon the trial, to call witnesses from the neighborhood to give their opinions that this business was injurious and offensive. Even if such opinions were erroneously secured, they were unnecessary and harmless, as, upon the undisputed evidence as to the character of the business carried on, the legal conclusion of the trial judge must have been the same.

But it is contended that the restriction agreement ought not, in this case, to be enforced, because most of the lots in the block between Forty Second and Forty-Third streets and Madison avenue and Vanderbilt avenue are no longer occupied for residences, and are devoted to business purposes; and the counsel for the appellant cites as an authority on this point one decision, in the case of Trustees of Columbia College v. Thacher. The principles of that case are not applicable to the facts of this. There it appeared that the contract which the plaintiff sought to enforce was no longer of any value to it, and that its enforcement would result in great damage to the defendant, without any benefit to any one. Here the plaintiff has the right to occupy her house as a residence, and in such occupation to have the protection of the restriction agreement. She has never violated the agreement herself, or consented to, or authorized or encouraged, its violation by others. In order to have the benefit of the agreement, she is not obliged to sue all its violators at once. She may proceed against them seriatim, or she may take no notice of the violations of the agreement by business carried on remotely from her residence, and enforce it against a business specially offensive to her by its proximity. This is not a case where the defendants can ask for immunity in an equitable forum because others are, in a greater or less degree, also violators of the agreement. The plaintiff has done nothing and omitted nothing which should authorize the occupant of an adjoining lot, in violation of the agreement, to make her residence uncomfortable and undesirable. Generally, whether an equity court will refuse to restrain the violation of such an agreement, and leave the parties to their legal remedies, on account of the changed condition affecting the premises to which the agreement relates, rests in the discretion of that court, and such discretion will not be reviewed upon appeal here. The question to be determined in the exercise of such discretion depends largely upon the facts, and mainly whether the enforcement of the agreement would greatly harm the defendant, without any substantial benefit to the plaintiff, so as to make the enforcement inequitable. We cannot say, reviewing all the evidence in this case, that it would be impossible for the plaintiff to enforce the agreement.

The appellant claims that the judgment is too broad in its restraints. But we think all his rights are fully protected by the sixth clause of the judgment, and the subsequent action of the court under that clause upon the application of the Taylor Company.

The matters to which we have thus given attention cover the whole ground of the appeal, and our conclusion is that the judgment must be affirmed, with costs.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Patrick F. McQUAID, Appt.,

v.

William C. ROSS et al., Respts.

(.....Wis.....)

No implied warranty of competency or fitness for breeding purposes is made by stock breeders on the sale of a bull, although a full price is paid and the sellers know that he is bought for breeding purposes, where there is no fraud or misrepresentation and both parties are alike destitute of knowledge or the means of forming an intelligent judgment as to the fitness or capacity of the animal for that purpose.

(June 21, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Columbia County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of warranty in the sale of a bull. Affirmed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

This case was before this court on a former appeal (77 Wis. 470), where the claims of the plaintiff are stated. Upon the new trial awarded the plaintiff sought to maintain that there was an implied warranty upon the sale by the defendants to the plaintiff of the bull in question, that he was in all respects fit, suitable, and competent to perform the service for which he was purchased, namely, to generate his kind; and the plaintiff produced evidence to show that when he bought the bull he desired him for breeding purposes; that the defendants were breeders of short NOTE.—Implied warranty of fitness of property bought for special purpose.

This note is limited in its scope to cases of articles purchased to answer a specific purpose, and does not include cases of sales by sample and by description. For a note upon the latter question, see Murchie v. Cornell, 14 L. R. A. 492.

The principles declared in the principal case are in keeping with the opinion of the court in Scott v. Benick, 1 B. Mon. 63, 35 Am. Dec. 177, where the court held, in the case of the sale of a Durham cow, that there was no implied warranty of her breeding fitness though purchased for that purpose, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation.

The case of Taylor v. Gardiner, 8 Man. L. Rep. 310, where a horse was sold for the like purposes, also holds that there is no implied warranty of fitness.

But in Hutchings v. Cole, 42 Ill. App. 261, where the seller of a mastiff bitch knowing that she was required for breeding purposes recommended her highly, stating that she was perfect in all respects except "that her teats were too loose for young puppies," the court held there was an implied warranty of fitness for the purposes required.

General principles.

A warranty will not be implied in conflict with the express terms of the agreement. Blackmore v. Fairbanks, 79 Iowa, 282.

There is no implied warranty of reasonable fitness where there is an express warranty concerning the quality. International Pav. Co. v. Smith, B. & R. Mach. Co. 17 Mo. App. 264.

And an express warranty of title does not exclude an implied one of quality. Blackmore v. Fairbanks, supra; Merriam v. Field, 24 Wis. 640; Boothby v. Scates, 27 Wis. 632; Roe v. Bachelder, 41 Wis. 300; Wilcox v. Owens, 64 Ga. 601.

Whether there is a warranty or not must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163.

The relation of the buyer to the seller may be of such a character as to impose a duty upon the seller, differing very little from a warranty. The circumstances attending the sale may be equivalent to a distinct affirmation on his part as to the quality of the thing sold. French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 3 Am. Rep. 440.

The question of an implied warranty that the article shall be fit for the purposes intended is limited to sales where the article is understood by both parties to be purchased for a specific use. Hart v. Wright, 17 Wend. 267, 273.

The fundamental inquiry is whether, under the circumstances of the particular case, the buyer had the right to rely, and necessarily relied, on the judgment of the seller and not upon his own. Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108, 28 L. ed. 80.

Where the purchaser necessarily trusts to the judgment of the seller of an article that it is fit for a particular purpose, there is an implied warranty that the commodity shall be reasonably fit for that purpose. Omaha Coal, C. & L. Co. v. Fay, 36 Neb. —; Morse v. Union Stockyards, 14 L. R. A. 157, 21 Or. 239; Hyatt v. Boyle, 5 Gill & J. 110, 25 Am. Dec. 276.

But the question of implied warranty upon non-inspection does not apply where the goods are not inspected merely because inconvenient or on account of labor involved. Hyatt v. Boyle, supra.

Such a warranty is raised where a party declines an examination upon the ground of his want of experience and judgment, and expressly declares that he relies upon the judgment of the other. Hanger v. Evans, 38 Ark. 334.

The warranty will extend to a reasonable performance of all the operations and purposes which the article ought reasonably to perform, but not to the performances and purposes of other kinds of articles which might be constructed for other operations and purposes. Robinson Mach. Works v. Chandler, 56 Ind. 575.

Even to extraordinary quality where the article is furnished for a given, specific purpose, and not for ordinary and general use. Misner v. Granger, 9 Ill. 60.

But not where the article is such that ordinary skill cannot make a good article, the matter being one of chance and risk. Ibid.

The goods must be reasonably fit for the intended purpose when treated as other goods of similar material are usually treated, though it require a different manner of use or treatment, where the necessity of such different treatment is known to the seller and not communicated to the purchaser or known to him. Omaha Coal, C. & L. Co. v. Fay, 36 Neb. —.

In such cases the vendors are bound as a condition of the contract to supply an article reasonably fit for the purpose, and a warranty will be implied. Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74, 82, 84 Am. Rep. 512; Ulrich v. Stohrer, 12 Phila. 190, where sugar was purchased for the express purpose of being used in the manufacture of mustard. Wilson v. Lawrence, 139 Mass. 318, 321; Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572; Thompson v. Tate, 5 N. C. 97, 8 Am. Dec. 673; Murray v. Smith, 4 Daly, 277.

horn Durham cattle, and knew the purpose for which the plaintiff desired and bought the animal; that he paid the full price of such an animal for breeding purposes, $125, and examined him at the time of the purchase; that, except for such purposes, the animal would not be worth to exceed $30. The plaintiff ascertained afterwards and in course of time that the bull was incompetent, impotent, and unable to generate his kind, and was useless for the purposes for which he was purchased and he returned the bull to the defendants at their farm for this reason; but there was no proof tending to show that they accepted him. Evidence was given to show the plaintiff's damages. The circuit court held that there was no implied warranty of the procreative powers of the bull, and granted a judgment of nonsuit against the plaintiff, from which he appealed.

Messrs. W. J. Hooper and Spensley & McIlhenn, for appellant:

The tendency of all the modern cases on warranty, is to enlarge the responsibility of the seller, and to construe every affirmation by him to be a warranty, and frequently to imply a warranty on his part from acts and circumstances, wherever they were relied upon by the buyer.

Story, Sales, §§ 359-365.

In certain classes of cases the vendor is held to warrant the existence of those attributes of title and quality to and in the property sold of which he assumes to have knowledge or about which he alone has the means of knowledge, or concerning which it is the policy of the law to charge him with knowledge.

10 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 91.

The doctrine of caveat emptor has so many limitations that it must be read in the light of

It is a breach of his contract if it is not so. Wilson v. Lawrence and Murray v. Smith, supra.

Where goods were sold as having a particular quality which if possessed would greatly increase their value, and they lacked such quality, the court held there was an implied warranty. Thompson v. Tate, supra.

Such a warranty is especially implied where the defect is occasioned by want of skill or care, or is the result of defective manufacture. Pease v. Sabin, 38 Vt. 432, 91 Am. Dec. 364, where cheese purchased for foreign shipment was infested with maggots.

Where hogs were purchased for market, the vendee relying upon the judgment of the vendor in his selection, and having no opportunity for inspection, there was held to be an implied warranty of fitness for market purposes. Best v. Flint, 53 Vt. 543, 56 Am. Rep. 570.

A sale of grain for full market price implies a warranty of its soundness in South Carolina. Bulwinkle v. Cramer, 27 S. C. 376.

Upon the purchase of a machine from a dealer there is an implied warranty that it is new and not second hand or the worse for wear, although the latter might fill the terms of a warranty. Grieb v. Cole, 60 Mich. 397.

But in the case of the sale of a second-hand article there is no implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose. Ramming v. Caldwell, 43 Ill. App. 175.

Evidence that the machine delivered, and for the price of which action was brought, was not the one contracted for is admissible, as where a second-hand machine was delivered for a new one. Grieb v. Cole, supra.

But where the buyer designates the materials out of which the manufacturer is to make the article there will be no implied warranty of quality or fitness if the latter uses the material in the absence of proof of want of ordinary care in selecting it. Shoenberger v. McEwen, 15 Ill. App. 496.

A distinction is to be drawn, however, between the purchase of a specific article and that of an article purchased for a specific purpose, as in the former case there is no implied warranty of the purpose. Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572; Goulds v. Brophy, 6 L. R. A. 392, 42 Minn. 109; Lukens v. Freilund, 27 Kan. 664; Walker v. Pue, 57 Md. 156; Port Carbon Iron Co. v. Groves, 68 Pa. 149; *Rice v. 23 L. R. A.

Yet there is an implied warranty as to workmanship and materials. Goulds v. Brophy, supra.

The question of fitness is one of fact, determinable by evidence. Sims v. Howell, 49 Ga. 623.

Contract executed or executory.

There is no warranty implied in the case of an executed sale of an article for a specified purpose, in the absence of fraud or deception, from the mere fact that the seller knew the purposes for which it was to be used. Dickson v. Jordan, 38 N. C. 166, 53 Am. Dec. 408; Bartlett v. Hoppock, 34 N. Y. 118, 38 Am. Dec. 428; Humphreys v. Comline, 8 Blackf. 516; Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572; Kohl v. Lindley, 39 Ill. 195, 59 Am. Dec. 294; Deming v. Foster, 42 N. H. 165.

Where the article sold is designed for a particular market or purpose, and so treated by both parties, it would seem that even in the case of a present sale a warranty would be implied that the article should answer the end in view. Howard v. Hoey, 23 Wend. 360, 35 Am. Dec. 572, where ale was sold for a southern market and soured.

Executory contracts do not depend upon the same principles as executed contracts of sale. Hargous v. Stone, 5 N. Y. 36.

Where the sale is executory, there is, in the absence of an opportunity for inspection, an implied warranty that the goods will answer the particular purpose for which the vendor knew they were purchased. Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 775; Flak v. Tank, 12 Wis. 276, 78 Am. Dec. 737; Pacific Iron Works v. Newhall, 34 Conn. 67; Overton v. Phelan, 2 Head. 445; *Donelson v. A warranty will be implied against all latent defects, when the seller knew that the buyer did not rely on his own judgment but on that of the seller, who knew, or might have known, the existence of the defect.

When the contract is executory and the defects in the goods patent and obvious, when the purchaser has a full opportunity for examination, and knows of such defects, he must, either when he receives the goods, or within what, under the circumstances, is a reasonable time, notify the seller of his nonacceptance, otherwise there will be a waiver of the defects. Morehouse v. Comstock, 48 Wis. 626; Locke v. Williamson, 40 Wis. 377.

When the goods are sold under an executory contract, the purchaser does not waive the implied warranty by the acceptance thereof. Babcock v. Trice, supra.

The acceptance under an executory contract with an opportunity of inspection and without complaint, only raises a presumption that the quality was right. Babcock v. Trice, 18 Ill. 420, 68 Am. Dec. 660.

But in an executory contract there is no implied warranty as to fitness or particular degree of quality. Misner v. Granger, 9 Ill. 69.

Again where hams were sold, knowing them to be purchased for a particular market, there was held to be an implied warranty of their fitness for that market as good, sound, and well prepared hams in the absence of the purchaser's being informed to the contrary. Leopold v. Van Kirk, 27 Wis. 152.

And where hay was bought for a particular use and the defendant knew plaintiff would not buy an inferior quality, it was held that the sale of the hay for the particular purpose ordinarily implied a certainty that it was fit for use. Beals v. Olmstead, 24 Vt. 114, 58 Am. Dec. 150.

So in Babcock v. Trice, 18 Ill. 420, 68 Am. Dec. 660, where there was an executory contract to deliver corn, the court held it must be fair and merchantable.

Where paris green was purchased for the purpose of killing worms in cotton, the court held that though there was no warranty, yet a contract for the sale of an article of the kind contracted for was implied. Jones v. George, 61 Tex. 345, 48 Am. Rep. 280.

Smith*, 11 L. R. A. 681, 45 Kan. 884.

It may be claimed that there was no implied warranty of breeding qualities in the bull because he was bought by the plaintiff on inspection.

From the nature of the case there could be no inspection to determine whether the animal was a breeding bull or not, by merely looking at him and examining him as the plaintiff did.

As was said in reference to the copper sheathing in Jones v. Bright, 5 Bing. 532, an inspection would have availed nothing, as the defects could not be discovered on inspection.

The same may be said in reference to the "Bristol cabbage seed" in White v. Miller, supra, the "black" in Murray v. Smith, supra, the lumber in rafts in Merriam v. Field, supra, the turnip seed in Wolcott v. Mount, supra, and the flax seed in Smith v. Shaw, supra.

A mere casual view or examination of a chattel by a purchaser does not defeat the warranty which the law would otherwise imply, on the sale of such chattel, when such view or examination would determine nothing as the qualities which the law implies, under the circumstances of such sale.

wants an article for any particular purpose, and applies to one professing skill in its manufacture, and the latter furnishes what he alleges to be suitable, the purchase is made upon the judgment and responsibility of the seller. Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163.

He is presumed by his skill and art, to understand the construction of his machine, and its adaptation to the purpose for which it was designed. Walton v. Cody, 1 Wis. 420.

The manufacturer or maker by his occupation holds himself out as competent to make articles reasonably adapted to the purposes for which such or similar articles are designed. Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108, 28 L. ed. 86.

If the buyer relied, and under the circumstances of the case had reason to rely, on the judgment of the seller, who was the manufacturer or maker of the article, the law implies a warranty that it is reasonably fit for the use for which it was designed, the seller at the time being informed of the purpose to devote it to that use. Ibid.

There is an implied warranty in the case of manufactured articles purchased for a particular use, made known at the time of the sale to the vendor, that they are reasonably fit for the use for which they are purchased. *French v. Wherever the vendor has himself manufactured the article sold, or procured it to be done by others, if honesty and fair dealing must be enforced, a warranty must be implied. Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163.

So the manufacturer of such goods impliedly warrants them to be made in a workmanlike manner. Union Hide & Leather Co. v. Reissig, Kohl v. Lindley and Archdale v. Moore, supra; Pease v. Sabin, 38 Vt. 432, 91 Am. Dec. 364; Waring v. Mason, 18 Wend. 425, 439.

So where the manufacturer knows that the article is for use in a particular place, the law implies a warranty of fitness for the place. McClamrock v. Flint, 101 Ind. 278.

But if the purchaser himself understands what he wants, and selects such goods as he deems adapted to the purpose, there is no warranty. Hoe v. Sanborn, supra.

And it has been held that a manufacturer was entitled to the same protection as any other vendor of the goods of such manufacturer would be, the rule as to implied warranties in the case of a manufacturer being abolished in Pennsylvania. Matthews v. Harston, 3 Pittsb. 86.

Where the party ordered a machine or other article from a manufacturer and designated the particular kind of material from which it was to be Messrs. Orton & Osborn and J. M. Smith for respondents.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no ground for contending that the plaintiff in purchasing the animal in question either asked the opinion or judgment of the vendors in respect to its procreative capacity, nor is there any reasonable or rational ground for imputing to them any information or knowledge on that subject not possessed by the plaintiff, although they had raised the bull, and were stock breeders. The plaintiff saw and inspected the animal before he made the purchase, and it was of the kind he desired to purchase. It is a well-understood principle of the common law in England, and almost universal in this country, that in sales of personal property in the absence of express warranty, where the buyer has an opportunity to inspect the commodity or thing sold, and the seller is guilty of no fraud, and is neither the manufacturer nor grower of the thing he sells, the maxim caveat emptor applies. This is the rule laid down in Benjamin on Sales, § 644; Barnard v. Kellogg, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 383, 19 L. ed. 987; Jones v. Just, L. R. 8 Q. B. 202. In Eagan v. Call, 84 Pa. 236, 75 Am. Dec. 653, it was held that where the buyer has had opportunity of examining the thing sold there is no implied warranty by the seller against latent defects unknown alike to himself and to the purchaser. The doctrine of implied warranty appears to be founded on an actual or presumed knowledge by the vendor, as manufacturer, grower, or producer, of the

made such material not being made by the manufacturer himself, there was held no implied warranty of quality or fitness in the absence of proof of want of reasonable and ordinary care on the manufacturer's part in the selection of the material. Shoenberger v. McEwen, 15 Ill. App. 493.

In Ricketts v. Sisson, 9 Dana, 353, 35 Am. Dec. 141, the court held that an artificer of any sort was not to be considered as undertaking that any machine, instrument, or vessel, which he made for the use and by the direction of another, and according to specifications furnished by his employer, should answer the purposes for which it was designed by the projector.

Where the article is to be of a particular design, pattern, or model, defined and understood between the parties, the article conforming to the design, there is no implied warranty of fitness but only of the materials and workmanship. Cosgrove v. Bennett, 22 Minn. 371.

But in the case of the sale of a specific article by a manufacturer, where the purchaser relies upon his own judgment there is no warranty of fitness for the required purposes implied. Olivant v. Bayley, 5 Q. B. 238; Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 Mees. & W. 399; Whitmore v. South Boston Iron Co. 2 Allen, 53; Archdale v. Moore, 19 Ill. 565; Howard v. Emerson, 110 Mass. 330; Port Carbon Iron Co. v. Groves, 68 Pa. 143.

There must be an undertaking, in some form, that the article shall be sufficient for the purpose, otherwise there is no responsibility, even though the vendor knows the purpose for which the purchaser intends to use the article. Wilson v. Lawrence, 139 Mass. 313, a case of a piano sold by a manufacturer to a dealer, the case of which checked, the court holding there was no implied warranty as to quality.

In Sanborn v. Herring, supreme court of New York, 6 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 457, it was held that a manufacturer who has his goods ready for sale to his customers places himself in the same position as other merchants with respect to any implied warranty, none being implied from the mere fact that he is the maker also.

Where a bridge company having partly executed a contract to construct a bridge, assigned their contract to another who agreed to complete the same within a given time for a stipulated price, and during the progress of the work under such agreement the deficiency of the work of the company, which could not otherwise have been discovered, became apparent, the court held that there was an implied warranty that the original work was reasonably sufficient for the purposes for which it was performed. Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 103, 23 L. ed. 86.

Where the contract was to deliver a pump for the specific purpose of exhausting water from a mine, a warranty was implied as to its form and structure. Getty v. Rountree, 2 Chand. 22, 54 Am. Dec. 133.

Where there was a contract to exercise skill and labor in the making of shingles for the purpose of covering defendant's house, the court implied a warranty of fitness for the purpose. Thomas v. Simpson, 30 N. C. 4.

Where there was a contract to manufacture and furnish bottles as "export beer bottles" without any express warranty the court held that there was an implied one that they should be conformable, as to kind, condition, and quality to that which would be understood by the trade from the term "export beer bottles." Ottawa Bottle & Flint Glass Co. v. Gunther, 31 Fed. Rep. 203.

Where rags were sold for the purpose of being manufactured into paper, it was held that the warranty was broken if they could not be used for that purpose without killing or sickening the employees engaged in such manufacture. Dushane v. Benedict, 120 U. S. 630, 30 L. ed. 810.

Where the seller knows that the goods are to be used for a particular purpose there is an implied warranty of fitness. Charles Baumbach Co. v. Gessler, 79 Wis. 567, wherein the purchaser requested the plaintiff by telephone to procure for him from the manufacturers in Europe catobet wafers of a certain quality suitable for holding patent "Headache Wafers."

Where the contract was to supply brick of a particular size and quality for a specified building according to specifications, the court held there was an implied warranty entitling the purchaser to damages in a cross-action. Bushman v. Taylor, 2 Ind. App. 12.

So in a contract for the sale and delivery of machinery for the purpose of working a corn mill known to the seller, the court held, there having been no opportunity to inspect, that there was an implied warranty of reasonable fitness for the purpose for which it was to be used and that it was in merchantable condition, unless the terms of the order excluded such warranty. Blackmore v. Fairbanks, 79 Iowa, 233. William A. Wood Mower & Reaper Co. v. Thayer, 50 Hun, 516, to the same effect.

Where the offer was for the purchase of "good salable corn," and the seller accepted the offer for one carload of corn, the court implied a warranty that the corn was good and salable. Holloway v. Jacoby, 120 Pa. 533.

In William A. Wood Mower & Reaper Co. v. Thayer, supra, where the defendant was the factor of the plaintiffs for the express purpose of making qualities and fitness of the thing sold for the purpose for which it was intended or is desired, so far as such knowledge is reasonably attainable. The rule must be held to have a rational foundation, and to be not of a purely arbitrary character. It does not impute to the seller knowledge as to qualities or fitness which no human foresight or skill can attain, and raise an implied warranty in respect to them, when the vendor and purchaser are in equal condition as to the means of knowledge, or the latter must have understood from the nature of the case that the information, experience, and knowledge of the vendor are sales of their machines, the court held that it was of the very essence of the contract that the machines they made should be salable.

So where a boiler and fireplace were sold by a manufacturer for the purpose of running a grist mill the court implied a warranty of sound material and workmanship. Beers v. Williams, 16 Ill. 69.

So where the iron used in the repair of a machine by the manufacturer proved worthless the court implied a warranty of fitness of material and workmanship. Union Hide & Leather Co. v. Reissig, 48 Ill. 75.

So where a manufacturer engaged "to furnish a steam boiler suitable to the engine" the court implied a warranty as to the boiler delivered. Street v. Chapman, 29 Ind. 142.

Again where the contract was for the manufacture and sale of whiskey barrels, the court implied a warranty of reasonable fitness for the use intended excepting only patent defects. Poland v. Miller, 25 Ind. 387, 48 Am. Rep. 730.

Where tobacco boxes were agreed to be furnished for the season for packing purposes, the dealers relying, according to custom, upon the manufacturer as to the nature of the material, and not testing the same, the court held, the boxes being unseasoned and causing mold, that there was an implied warranty as to fitness. Gerst v. Jones, 22 Gratt. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 775.

So in the case of varnish sold for the manufacture and finish of carriages by a manufacturer, the law implied a warranty that the article so manufactured and sold was adequate to the purpose for which sold. Bird v. Mayer, 8 Wis. 362.

In the case of a sale by a manufacturer of leather for the particular purpose of the manufacturer, there is an implied warranty of soundness for those purposes. Downing v. Dearborn, 77 Me. 457.

So in the case of a piano sold by a manufacturer to the dealer for resale, there is an implied warranty as to the material and workmanship, and fitness for use, and that it is reasonably fit as a good instrument of its class and price, and if below its standard a breach ensues. Snow v. The Schomacker Mfg. Co., 69 Ala. 111, 44 Am. Rep. 508.

Where the defendants had contracted to manufacture for the plaintiffs an iron kettle for the purpose of making iron liquors, and to deliver it to the plaintiffs, the same being found to leak, the court refused to allow exceptions to the instructions in the court below that the defendants having undertaken to deliver the kettle, if the leak was caused by the defendants before it was set up either by careless workmanship or transportation the defendants were liable. Taylor v. Cole, 111 Mass. 368.

Where a manufacturer or dealer contracts to supply an article which he manufactures, or in which he deals, to be applied to a particular purpose, so that the buyer necessarily trusts to the judgment or skill of the manufacturer or dealer, there is, in that case, an implied warranty that the article is reasonably fit for the purpose to which it is to be applied. Hight v. Bacon, 123 Mass. 10, 30 Am. Rep. 639.

Where a manufacturer who had previously supplied goods of a certain quality to the plaintiff subsequently filled another order for the same quality of goods, with goods of an inferior nature, the 23 L. R. A.

court held him liable even though the purchaser did not test them before using, having a right to rely upon the goods being of such quality. Bagley v. Cleveland Roll Mill Co., 21 Fed. Rep. 159.

Where leather was sold by a manufacturer to a shoe manufacturer, for the purpose of manufacturing shoes, the court held there was an implied warranty of the soundness and suitability of the leather. Downing v. Dearborn, 77 Me. 457.

So in a contract for the sale of oil barrels not fit for use until prepared by a certain gluing process the court held that there was an implied warranty that the work was suitable, sufficient to constitute a defense in an action for their price. Ryers v. Chapin, 28 Ohio St. 305.

Where a manufacturer of bolts and nuts purchased of a consumer a ton of a superior brand of iron under the advice of the manufacturer of the iron with a view to inducing a larger sale by the first-mentioned manufacturer the court held in a contract between the iron and the bolt and nut manufacturer a warranty implied that the iron sold and delivered should be equal to that tried by the latter. Dayton v. Hooglund, 39 Ohio St. 671.

Where the manufacturer was to deliver a pump for the purpose of pumping water from a mine the court implied a warranty of form and structure suitable to that purpose. Getty v. Rountree, 2 Pinney, 379, 64 Am. Dec. 128.

In the case of a sale of a piano by a manufacturer to a dealer, where the case of the instrument checked, the court held that there was no implied warranty as to quality, and that the defendant was only bound to furnish one merchantable and salable as a piano at some price. Wilson v. Lawrence, 129 Mass. 318.

In Ketchum v. Wells, 19 Wis. 25, where stave bolts were to be manufactured and delivered to the defendants, manufacturers of barrels and staves, the court implied a warranty of fitness for the purpose.

So in the case of fire brick knowingly sold for a particular purpose, the court implied a warranty of fitness for that purpose. Tacoma Coal Co. v. Bradley, 2 Wash. 600.

In the case of the manufacture of a steam engine with a cut-off known as "Greens' Patent Cut-Off," for the defendant, and represented as of particular usefulness, the court held, in an action for the price, it appearing that it was claimed by another as his patent, that there was a failure of consideration to the extent of the value of the cut-off in connection with the engine. Pacific Iron Works v. Newhall, 34 Conn. 67.

In such a case there was a warranty that the defendant would have a right to use the patent. Ibid.

Upon the sale of tobacco to a manufacturer to be manufactured, the court held that the words "sound order," meant to insure the sound condition at the time of arrival at the factory and for a reasonable time afterwards. Reynolds v. Palmer, 21 Fed. Rep. 433.

Where plaintiffs, manufacturers of steel, with full knowledge of the uses to which the steel was to be applied, wrote defendants, manufacturers of axes, offering best axe cast steel equal to any brand of English cast steel, the court held there was an implied warranty that the steel made articles as good as the best English in quality. Park v. Morris Axe & Tool Co., 4 Lana. 103.

not superior to his own. The case we are considering is not one where the buyer can be said necessarily or at all to have trusted to the judgment or skill of the manufacturer, grower, producer, or dealer, instead of his own. Jones v. Just, L. R. 3 Q. B. 202. Because the defendants raised the bull they sold to the plaintiff they are not chargeable with any knowledge, or opinion even, in respect to a matter beyond the reasonable scope of human knowledge, namely, whether the bull would prove impotent, and to be wholly destitute of the power of procreating his kind; and hence the ground of presumed or

Where the contract was for the manufacture of a steam engine and boiler which proved, after fair trial, not to accomplish the end for which designed, the court held, the contract being executory, that the article might be returned within a reasonable time upon the implied warranty. Freeman v. Clute, 3 Barb. 424.

Where ice was sold to a retail dealer with a knowledge that it was for resale to customers, without disclosing its known impure condition, the court held there was deceit which exempted the purchaser from payment of the full price even though he had sold the same and no representations were made as to quality even though the purchaser inquired of others. Joplin Water Co. v. Batha, 41 Mo. App. 235.

Where the plaintiffs contracted with the defendant for the manufacture of articles described as "all the horn chains they manufacture," the question was, whether the words "horn chains manufactured" implied a warranty that the chains were wholly of horn, the court ruled that if there was an article called and known by that name made partly of horn and partly of hoof, and such an article was intended, it was sufficient. Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 365, 3 Am. Rep. 471.

In Troy Laundry Mach. Co. v. Henry (Or.) Nov. 28, 1892, the contract was for a roll body ironer and machinery and pulley to operate the same, the court held that the fact that the machine did not work right by reason of the pulley being unfit was due to a breach of the implied warranty as to the pulley and not of the machine so as to bar an action for the price of the latter.

Where the sale was of sweet pickled pork shoulders deliverable at Dubuque for shipment to the plaintiff without an opportunity of examination or knowing of its qualities, which upon inspection on delivery showed nothing wrong except that the pickle was not as pure as it might have been, the bad qualities only appearing upon smoking it, the court held that there was no implied warranty of quality. Ryan v. Ulmer, 108 Pa. 382, 56 Am. Rep. 210.

Where the order called for "1 No. 4 safe with combination lock," and the plaintiffs shipped one of their make "No. 4 with combination lock," the court held there was a strict compliance with the order and that there was no implied warranty as to the merit or usability of the lock. Tilton Safe Co. v. Tiedale, 48 Vt. 83.

Depreciation of article.

A warranty will not be implied against a necessary and likely depreciation in quality between the date of the contract and the delivery of the article. Reynolds v. Palmer, 21 Fed. Rep. 433.

Where a manufacturer contracts to deliver a manufactured article at a distant place he must stand the risk of any ordinary or unusual deterioration, but the vendee is bound to accept the article if only deteriorated to the extent that it is necessarily subject to in its course of transit from one place to the other; he must bear the risk of the deterioration necessarily consequent upon the transmission. Bull v. Robinson, 10 Exch. 342; Mann v. Everston, 22 Ind. 365; Leggat v. Sandsale Brewing Co. 60 Ill. 158; English v. Spokane Commission Co. 37 Fed. Rep. 451, a case of shipment of eggs and potatoes.

In the case of goods purchased for shipment for a particular trade, the warranty only extends to the condition of the goods (hams) at the time of sale, the question as to their unsoundness at the end of the voyage being for the jury to find whether the defects were latent and existed prior or subsequent to shipment. Leopold v. Van Kirk, 27 Wis. 152.

Where goods were shipped from a distance without any opportunity of examination of quality, the court allowed evidence of bad quality when received together with expert evidence to show that if properly packed and good when shipped the goods ought not to have spoiled by the way. Ryan v. Ulmer, 108 Pa. 382, 56 Am. Rep. 210.

Where corn meal was purchased as kiln-dried corn meal, for shipment, the court held that there was an implied warranty that it was properly packed and fit for such shipment, but that such warranty did not extend to any length of time. Mann v. Everston, 22 Ind. 365.

But where ale was sold for transportation and resale the court refused to imply a warranty of quality so as to cover transportation for a considerable distance or as to its quality at the end of such a voyage. Leggat v. Sand's Ale Brewing Co. 60 Ill. 158.

Latent defects.

The universal doctrine is, that whenever the article sold has some latent defect which is known to the seller, but not to the purchaser, the former is liable for this defect, if he fails to disclose his knowledge on the subject at the time of the sale. Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163.

The fact that one dealer knows the purposes for which the other dealer purchased does not render him liable for unknown defects which make the article unfit for use. Howard v. Emerson, 110 Mass. 320.

Upon the sale of a chattel by a manufacturer, a warranty is implied that the article is sold free from any latent defects growing out of the process of manufacture the knowledge of the vendor being presumed superior. White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 18; Hoe v. Sanborn, supra; Leopold v. Van Kirk, 27 Wis. 152; Pease v. Sabin, 38 Vt. 432, 91 Am. Dec. 364; Hoult v. Baldwin, 67 Cal. 610.

Yet if the defect is in the materials employed, such liability only attaches in case of knowledge of the defect. Hoe v. Sanborn, supra.

The fair presumption is that the maker or manufacturer understands the process of its manufacture, and is cognizant of any latent defects caused by such process and against which reasonable diligence might have guarded. Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108, 28 L. ed. 56.

The doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply to the case of a latent defect in goods purchased for a specific purpose, known to the plaintiffs and concealed by them from the defendant. Downing v. Dearborn, 77 Me. 457.

The same conclusion was arrived at in the case of sales for a particular purpose known to the seller in Boothby v. Scales, 27 Wis. 623.

If there is no opportunity to inspect the article, or if from the situation inspection is impracticable or useless, it is unreasonable to suppose that the purchaser bought on his own judgment or that he did not rely on the judgment of the seller as to lareasonably imputed knowledge as a foundation in this case of an implied warranty wholly fails. In the case of White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 131, 27 Am. Rep. 13, it is said in relation to the case of a manufacturer that the rule of implied warranty "is based on the presumed superior knowledge of the vendor," and that, in the case of a producer or grower of seeds, there seems to be the same reason for implying a warranty on a sale of seeds by the grower that they are not defective from improper cultivation as to imply a warranty of freedom of defects in manufacture on a sale by a manufacturer of the tent defects of which the latter, if he used due care, must have been informed during the process of manufacture. Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, supra.

Where the contract was to manufacture and deliver steam boilers for the purpose of running engines at a rolling mill, the court held that there was an implied warranty that they should be free from defects of material and workmanship, latent or otherwise, as rendered them unfit for the uses required of them. Rodgers v. Niles, 11 Ohio St. 48, 78 Am. Dec. 280.

Under the Louisiana law there is an implied warranty against latent defects. Bulkley v. Honold, 60 U. S. 19 How. 390, 15 L. ed. 663; Civil Code, arts. 2450, 2451, a case of the sale of a vessel decayed and rotten in the hull, to discover which it would have been necessary to strip and bore.

Knowledge of purpose.

It is a doctrine of the civil law that there is an implied warranty of fitness of an article for a specific purpose, from the knowledge on the seller's part, that the article is required for that purpose. Bartlett v. Hoppock, 84 N. Y. 118, 88 Am. Dec. 428.

The scienter is not only a material but a vital point of the case. French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 8 Am. Rep. 440.

It is, in the absence of a warranty, the gist of the action. Kingsbury v. Taylor, 29 Me. 508, 50 Am. Dec. 607.

The question is one of fact as to the actual contract between the parties. Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163.

If the vendor can be proved to have had knowledge of the defect, and failed to disclose it, he is liable. Ibid.

When the knowledge of the vendor is proved by direct evidence, his responsibility rests upon the ground of fraud. Ibid; Kingsbury v. Taylor, supra.

An implied warranty in respect to quality rests upon a presumption, in the particular case, that the vendor knew of the defect. Hoe v. Sanborn, supra; Moses v. Mead, 1 Denio, 378, 48 Am. Dec. 673; Hauser v. Curran, 25 Ohio L. J. 52.

The manufacturer of a machine who knows that it is to be used for a specified purpose, impliedly warrants its fitness for that purpose. Hauser v. Curran, supra; McClamrock v. Flint, 101 Ind. 278; Brenton v. Davis, 8 Blackf. 817, 44 Am. Dec. 769; Page v. Ford, 12 Ind. 46; Street v. Chapman, 29 Ind. 142; Gerst v. Jones, 32 Gratt. 518, 34 Am. Rep. 775; Conant v. National State Bank of Terre Haute, 121 Ind. 823; Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108, 23 L. ed. 86; Ottawa Bottle & Flint-Glass Co. v. Gunther, 31 Fed. Rep. 208; Pease v. Sablin, 38 Vt. 432, 91 Am. Dec. 364; Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136; Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74, 32, 34 Am. Rep. 512; Lee v. J. B. Sickles Saddlery Co. 38 Mo. App. 201; Chester Steel Castings Co. v. Browncombe, 7 Kulp, 136.

Where the purchaser has no opportunity to exercise his own judgment, and therefore relies upon that of the vendor, a warranty of fitness will be implied. Brantley v. Thomas, 22 Tex. 270, 73 Am. Dec. 264; Chester Steel Castings Co. v. Browncombe, supra; Best v. Flint, 58 Vt. 543, 56 Am. Rep. 570.

Where the vendor is not the manufacturer, and where the vendee has equal knowledge and opportunity of knowledge of the character or quality of the article sold, the vendor is only liable upon an express warranty. Bartlett v. Hoppock, 84 N. Y. 118, 88 Am. Dec. 428; Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108, 23 L. ed. 86.

It has been held that even though the vendor has knowledge of the purposes for which the purchaser intends to use the article, yet there must be an undertaking, in some form, that the article shall be sufficient for the purpose. Wilson v. Lawrence, 139 Mass. 318, where a piano was sold by a manufacturer to a dealer, the case of which checked, the court holding there was no implied warranty as to quality.

Knowledge will not be inferred where the vendor presumes the purposes for which the goods are to be used, in the absence of fraud. Hight v. Bacon, 126 Mass. 10, 30 Am. Rep. 639.

Thus where the plaintiff purchased "xx pipe-iron" for a specific purpose requiring the iron to be soft, and tough, that purchased being hard and brittle, and unfit for the purpose, the court held the vendor not being the manufacturer, that it was not enough to show that the plaintiff knew the purpose, and that a specific warranty should have been exacted and his knowledge could not be presumed. Dounce v. Dow, 64 N. Y. 411.

In strong cases, however, the court will presume the knowledge on the part of the vendor without proof and hold him responsible upon an implied warranty. Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163.

Effect of inspection.

If the purchaser inspects for himself the specific goods sold, and there is no express warranty, and the seller is guilty of no fraud, and is not himself the manufacturer of the goods sold, the doctrine caveat emptor applies even though the seller presumed the purposes for which the goods were required. Hight v. Bacon, 126 Mass. 10, 30 Am. Rep. 639; Dounce v. Dow, 64 N. Y. 411; Cunningham v. Hall, 4 Allen, 288; Lindley v. Hunt, 22 Fed. Rep. 52.

Where the means of knowledge are at hand, and equally available to both parties, and the subject is open to the inspection of both parties alike, there is no implied warranty. Rocchi v. Schwabacher, 38 La. Ann. 1364.

On the sale of an article by a specific description not inspected, but known to the parties, there is an implied warranty of the particular description, but not of quality or value. Catchings v. Hacke, 15 Mo. App. 51; Whitaker v. McCormick, 6 Mo. App. 114.

An opportunity to inspect the goods must be given before the maxim caveat emptor, can apply. Hood v. Bloch Bros, 29 W. Va. 244.

A warranty of kind may be inferred upon a sale of seed from a bona fide statement of the vendor as to kind in cases where an inspection will not help the purchaser. Wolcott v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 496, 20 Am. Rep. 425.

Where the goods are in transit and the purchaser has had no opportunity of examining them, they must be merchantable in quality. Newbery v. Wall, 3 Jones & S. 103, where fute was found to be inferior in quality. Cleu v. McPherson, 1 Bosw. 489; Reed v. Randall, 29 N. Y. 358, 36 Am. Dec. 305; and Peck v. Armstrong, 38 Barb. 215, followed.

article made by him. "The grower of seeds must be presumed to be cognizant of any omissions or negligence in cultivation, whereby they have been deteriorated or rendered unfit for use;" as, in the case cited, in relation to a sale of cabbage seed which had been crossed with other varieties, and rendered impure by being raised in close proximity with them. In Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136, cited by appellant's counsel, the article sold was represented to be of a particular kind, when it was not, and there was, therefore, an express warranty. In Flick v. Wetherbee, 20 Wis.

Where the purchaser has no opportunity of examining the goods, there is an implied warranty as to quality for the purposes desired and also that they are merchantable. Curtis & Co. Mfg. Co. v. Williams, 48 Ark. 325; Getty v. Rountree, 2 Pinney, 379, 2 Chand. 28, 54 Am. Dec. 138; Hood v. Bloch Bros., supra; J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Smith, 16 Or. 361; Smith v. Hightower, 76 Ga. 629; Wolcott v. Mount, 30 N. J. L. 262, 13 Am. Rep. 438; Dawes v. Peebles, 6 Fed. Rep. 856, a case of soda water apparatus; Kohl v. Lindley, 39 Ill. 196, 30 Am. Dec. 294, as to quality and condition; Best v. Flint, 58 Vt. 543, 56 Am. Rep. 570, where hogs were sold for market relying upon the vendor's judgment; Osgood v. Lewis, 2 Harr. & G. 496, 18 Am. Dec. 317; Merriam v. Field, 24 Wis. 640, where lumber in rafts was sold, its inspection being incapable of performance. Chicago Pkg. & Prov. Co. v. Tilton, 87 Ill. 547.

Such a rule however would not seem to apply to the case of a sale of a dealer not himself the manufacturer. Ibid.

Such a warranty has been held to exist in the case of executory contract, even where there is an opportunity to inspect. Misner v. Granger, 9 Ill. 62.

So where the vendee does not inspect the property but relies upon the seller, the former is not bound by defects which would have been noticed upon inspection. Hanks v. McKee, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 227, 13 Am. Dec. 265.

The doctrine of an implied warranty from the fact of no opportunity to inspect applies only to cases where such inspection is impracticable and not to cases where it is merely inconvenient or laborious. Hyatt v. Boyle, 5 Gill & J. 110, 25 Am. Dec. 276.

Articles of food, etc.

In the case of the sale of articles of food to be consumed directly in domestic uses, there is as between the dealer and consumer an implied warranty that such articles are sound and wholesome. Winsor v. Lombard, 18 Pick. 61; French v. Vining, 108 Mass. 183, 3 Am. Rep. 440; Howard v. Emerson, 110 Mass. 320; Van Bracklin v. Fonda, 12 Johns. 468, 7 Am. Dec. 336; Moses v. Mead, 1 Denio, 378, 43 Am. Dec. 673; Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163; Hart v. Wright, 17 Wend. 267, 272; Hyland v. Sherman, 2 E. D. Smith, 234; Divine v. McCormick, 50 Barb. 116; Burch v. Spencer, 15 Hun, 504; Hoover v. Peters, 18 Mich. 51; Goad v. Johnson, 6 Helsk. 240; Lukens v. Freund, 27 Kan. 664; Sinclair v. Hathaway, 57 Mich. 60, 58 Am. Rep. 337; Ryder v. Neitge, 21 Minn. 70; McNaughton v. Joy, 1 W. N. C. 470; Osgood v. Lewis, 2 Harr. & G. 495, 18 Am. Dec. 317; Jones v. Murray, 3 T. B. Mon. 88; Moore v. McKinlay, 5 Cal. 471; Getty v. Rountree, 2 Pinney, 379, 2 Chand. 28, 54 Am. Dec. 138; Fairbank Canning Co. v. Metzger, 43 Hun, 71; Copas v. Anglo-American Provision Co. 73 Mich. 541; Williams v. Slaughter, 3 Wis. 847; Humphreys v. Comline, 8 Blackf. 516.

Such purchases being usually made with a reliance upon the supposed skill of the seller. French v. Vining, supra.

Warranty of fitness is implied in such cases from the payment of a sound price. Van Bracklin v. Fonda and Hart v. Wright, supra.

Where there was some evidence that the defendant knew the animal to be diseased before it was slaughtered, the court held that in the sale of provisions for domestic use, the vendor was bound to know that they were sound and wholesome at his peril. Van Bracklin v. Fonda, supra.

Where the plaintiffs, buyers and packers of pork for shipment for market for food, purchased a hog from defendant who knew the same to be boar meat unfit for food, that it was intended to be used for food, and not for manufacture into grease or tallow, and that they concealed and denied the facts, the court implied a warranty of fitness for food. Burch v. Spencer, supra.

Where a heifer was sold, the vendor knowing it to be for immediate consumption, and having knowledge or reason to suspect that it is diseased and unwholesome, the vendor was held bound to make his knowledge known even though the disease was not externally visible. Divine v. McCormick, supra.

In Goad v. Johnson, 6 Helsk. 240, the court held that the rule making the seller responsible for defects unknown, applied to provisions only and was founded upon statutory enactment and not upon any implied warranty.

In Sinclair v. Hathaway, 57 Mich. 60, 58 Am. Rep. 327, where a baker sold bread at a discount to a peddler, for sale, not as a wholesale dealer but as a mere middleman and acting as his agent in his employ, the court held that a baker impliedly warranted the wholesomeness of his bread.

It has, however, been denied that anything can be inferred from the sale of provisions, which may not be inferred from a like purpose in other cases. Wright v. Hart, 18 Wend. 464; Emerson v. Brigham, 10 Mass. 197; Winsor v. Lombard, 18 Pick. 57.

Where hams were purchased from a wholesale dealer and manufacturer without an opportunity of inspection, and packed by a process unknown to the purchaser, there was held to be an implied warranty of their fitness for food. Copas v. Anglo-American Provision Co. 73 Mich. 541.

But where the question arises as between one dealer and another, as where such articles are sold as merchandise and not as food or provisions, the courts have held that there is not, in the absence of fraud, any such implied warranty of fitness. Howard v. Emerson, 110 Mass. 320; Emerson v. Brigham, and Winsor v. Lombard, supra; Hart v. Wright, 17 Wend. 267; Wright v. Hart, 18 Wend. 449; Moses v. Mead, 1 Denio, 378, 43 Am. Dec. 673; Burnby v. Rollitt, 16 Mees. & W. 644; Giroux v. Stedman, 145 Mass. 439; Rinschler v. Jelliffe, 9 Daly, 469; Goldrich v. Ryan, 3 E. D. Smith, 324; Miller v. Scherder, 3 N. Y. 268; Ryder v. Neitge, 21 Minn. 70; Mattoon v. Rice, 102 Mass. 226; Hyland v. Sherman, 3 E. D. Smith, 234; Goad v. Johnson, 6 Helsk. 240; Jones v. Murray, 3 T. B. Mon. 88; Humphreys v. Comline, 8 Blackf. 516; Fairbank Canning Co. v. Metzger, 43 Hun, 71.

So in Humphreys v. Comline, supra, where molasses was sold in barrels as merchandise, the court holding that an inspection was not impracticable.

And where a farmer killed a hog and sold it with a knowledge that it was to be used for food, the court held there was no implied warranty as to fitness for human food, the sale not being made by common dealers or marketmen, and only a casual one without any guilty knowledge of the defect. Giroux v. Stedman, supra.

In Emerson v. Brigham, 10 Mass. 197, a case of a sale of barrels of unwholesome beef, purchased by the plaintiffs from the defendants and shipped by the latter to a certain market for sale, the court held that in the absence of a willful false affirmation or representation, or fraud or artifice, an action for deceit was not maintainable.

893, the decision went not upon the ground of implied warranty, but that the defendant covenanted to supply all the seed corn for the year's cultivation, which it was held required him to furnish good seed corn, and there was, besides, evidence of an express warranty. The case of Scott v. Kenick, 1 B.

Mon. 63, 35 Am. Dec. 177, in which it was held that the law implies no warranty, in a sale of a Durham cow, that she will prove suitable for breeding purposes, although the price paid for her indicated that it was for that purpose she was bought; and this is in accord with what was said in White v. Steel.

Where cattle were sold at market by a drover to a butcher, no implied warranty was raised in the absence of misrepresentation, concealment, or knowledge of injury. Goldrich v. Ryan, 3 R. D. Smith, 324.

Where hogs were sold to be used in the plaintiff's meat market, and were examined by him and found not to be in the best condition, the defendant stating, however, that they were healthy as far as he knew, there being no perceptible disease, the court held, the hogs having died from cholera and become worthless by disease existing at the time of purchase, that in the absence of an express warranty there was no implied warranty of their fitness for slaughter. Needham v. Dial (Tex. Civ. App.) Sept. 20, 1893.

In such cases in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation as to quality or an express warranty, there is no implied warranty as to latent defects in the absence of knowledge (Rinschler v. Jelliffe, 9 Daly, 469), where the buyer made all the examination he required.

Yet it has been held such a warranty would be implied in such sales whether the sale was by a retail dealer or any other person. Hoover v. Peters, 18 Mich. 51.

Where hay upon which white lead was known to have been spilt was sold for feeding a cow which died from the poison, the court held the vendor liable for the loss, placing the liability upon the ground of deceit, or knowledge of the bad condition of the article. French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 3 Am. Rep. 440.

But in Lukens v. Frelund, 27 Kan. 664, the court held that there was no implied warranty in the case of food sold for the express purpose of feeding cattle.

There is an implied warrant upon a sale of drugs that they are of the character asked for. Jones v. George, 56 Tex. 149, 43 Am. Rep. 689.

Provisions of the state codes and statutes.

Under section 1192 of the Civil Code of Alabama, there is an implied warranty by the planter of cotton sent to a factor for sale with such factor or the purchaser of the cotton that it is not fraudulently packed.

Under section 1769 of the Civil Code of California, one who sells or agrees to sell an article of his own manufacture thereby warrants it to be free from any latent defects, not disclosed to the buyer, arising from the process of manufacture, and also that neither he nor his agent in such manufacture has knowingly used improper materials therein. Hoult v. Baldwin, 67 Cal. 610.

By section 1770 of the same Code, a manufacturer of an article under an order for a particular purpose warrants it reasonably fit for that purpose. Ibid.

Where a steel rope or cable was to be manufactured for the operation of street cars, which upon trial failed in its purpose and was returned, the court refused an action by the plaintiff for the price of the rope. Hallidie v. Sutter Street R. Co. 63 Cal. 575.

But it has been held that firewood is not within 22 L. R. A. section 1770 of such Code. Correto v. Lynch, 65 Cal. 273.

And section 1771 of the same Code provides an implied warranty in case of the sale of merchandise inaccessible to the examination of the buyer. Moore v. McKinlay, 5 Cal. 471, a case of sale of goods at sea.

And under section 1775 of the same Code there is a warrant of soundness and wholesomeness in the sale of provisions for domestic use, and actual consumption.

By section 1008 of the Civil Code of Dakota, in the case of merchandise not in existence there was a warranty of soundness and merchantable quality at the place of production contemplated by the parties, and as nearly so at the place of delivery as can be secured by reasonable care.

Section 1009 of the same Code implies warranties against latent defects in the case of a sale of an article of one's own manufacture, not disclosed, arising from process of manufacture, and that neither he nor his agent has used improper material.

And by virtue of section 1010, a manufacturer of an article for a particular purpose warrants it reasonably fit for that purpose. Sycamore Marsh Harvester Co. v. Sturm (Neb.) Aug. 30, 1892.

So by section 1011 of the same Code the seller of merchandise inaccessible to the examination of the buyer, warrants it sound and merchantable.

Under section 1015 of such Civil Code the seller of provisions for domestic use warrants to the purchaser for actual consumption, and not to the purchaser for sale, that they are sound and wholesome.

Under section 2651 of the Code of Georgia, ed. 1882, p. 655, there is an implied warranty that the article is merchantable, and reasonably suited to the use intended, and further, against latent defects undisclosed.

The seller warrants that the article is merchantable and reasonably fit for the use intended, and that he knows of no latent defects. Williams v. Wyllie, 45 Ga. 590; Code, § 2609.

Under sections 2708, 3421, of the Georgia Code, a partial apportionment must be made upon a failure of consideration, and pleaded by way of defense to a latent defect. Ibid.

Under the code of this state it has been held that in the sale of a fertilizer there is an implied warranty of its reasonable fitness for the purposes intended where sold at market value of the sort contracted for. Radcliff v. Gunby, 46 Ga. 484; Sims v. Howell, 49 Ga. 620; Gammell v. Gunby, 52 Ga. 504; Wilcox v. Cunningham, 54 Ga. 490.

There is an implied warranty that it is manure, and will increase the quality of the land. Wilcox v. Hall, 53 Ga. 635.

And the fact that a declaration that "this fertilizer is sold under the inspection and analysis of Dr. A. Means, Inspector at Savannah, and the department of agriculture at Atlanta," has been held not to affect the implied warranty of quality. Austin v. Cox, 60 Ga. 620. To the same effect Wilcox v. Owens, 64 Ga. 601; Allen v. Young, 63 Ga. 617.

The fitness of such article is not proved conclusively by evidence that the manufacturers made an article containing fertilizing ingredients. Sims v. Howell, supra.

The fact that the manufacturers of a fertilizer make an article containing such ingredients is not loh, 74 Wis. 485, 429, on the subject of implied warranty in a similar case. Barnes v. Burns, 81 Wis. 235. If the plaintiff desired to guard against loss from the contingency which occurred, he should have exacted an express warranty as a condition of his purchase. Where, as in this case, both parties were alike destitute of knowledge or the means of forming an intelligent judgment whether the bull would be able or not to generate his kind, and there was no misrepresentation or fraud, and no express warranty, conclusive proof of its fitness for the use intended. Ibid.

There is, however, no warranty that such fertilizer is suited to the land nor against the seasons. Wilcox v. Hall, 53 Ga. 635.

Where patent defects in the machine were pointed out, the statement of the seller that they can be repaired implies a warranty under the Code, section 2651, that after such repairs are made the machine will be reasonably fit for the purposes for which intended. Cochran v. Jones, 85 Ga. 678.

By section 3245 of the Revised Statutes of Idaho, one making a business of selling provisions for domestic use warrants them sound and wholesome.

English doctrine.

A term is implied in every contract to furnish manufactured goods, that they shall be merchantable. Laing v. Fidgeon, 6 Taunt. 106, 4 Camp. 160; Morgan v. Gath, 3 Hurlst. & C. 748.

In Jones v. Just, L. R. 3 Q. B. 197, the court held that where a manufacturer or a dealer contracts to supply an article which he manufactures or produces, or in which he deals, to be applied to a particular purpose, so that the buyer necessarily trusts to the judgment or skill of the manufacturer or dealer, there is in that case an implied term of warranty that it shall be reasonably fit for the purpose to which it is to be applied.

In such a case the buyer trusts to the manufacturer or dealer and relies upon his judgment and not upon his own. Jones v. Just, supra.

Where the defendant, a manufacturer, supplied copper sheathing for the plaintiff's vessel which turned out to be defective in a short time after use, and the jury found that there was some intrinsic defect in the value of the copper, the court held that as the defendant manufactured the copper and knew the purposes for which it was supplied, there was an implied warranty of fitness. Jones v. Bright, 3 Moore & P. 155, 5 Bing. 533.

If the purchaser relies upon the judgment of the seller, and informs him of the use to which the article is to be applied, the transaction carries with it an implied warranty that the thing furnished shall be fit and proper for the purpose for which it was designed. Brown v. Edgington, 2 Mann. & G. 279.

If an order is given for the manufacture or supply of an article to answer a required purpose, the purpose and not the specific article being the essential matter, the seller is bound to supply an article reasonably fit for the purpose and impliedly warrants its fitness. Olivant v. Bayley, 5 Q. B. 238, 1 Dav. & M. 373.

In the case of a sale of goods by a manufacturer thereof not otherwise a dealer in them, there is, in the absence of usage in the particular trade or as regards the particular goods to supply those of other makers, an implied warranty that they are the manufacturer's own make. Johnson v. Raylton, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 438.

Where the vendor undertook that copper sheathing should be sound, good, substantial, and serviceable copper, and there was no proof of a warranty such as declared upon, the court held that there was no implied warranty against latent defects, although sold as "copper sheathing." Gray v. Cox, 6 Dowl. & R. 200, 8 Dowl. & R. 220.

Where the written instrument containing the terms of the sale by the builder of a barge was silent as to any warranty, the court implied a warranty of fitness for the purposes for which he knew it to be purchased. Shepherd v. Pybus, 4 Scott, N. R. 434, 3 Mann. & G. 68.

Where a crane rope was ordered by a wine merchant from a dealer who held himself out as the manufacturer of ropes, and who upon being told of the purposes for which it was required stated that one would have to be made specially, the court held there was an implied warranty of fitness even though the rope was not manufactured by such dealer but made by another under his orders. Brown v. Edgington, 2 Mann. & G. 279, 2 Scott, N. R. 496.

Where a safe was bought of the manufacturer, under an alleged warranty that it was strong enough to resist all attempts that might be made to force it open, it being broken open easily more than six years after the sale and delivery, the court held there was an absolute warranty of security at all times, and was so extensive that it was cogent evidence alone of express warranty to that extent, and was not sustained by proof of mere representations that the safe would resist burglars. Walker v. Milner, 4 Post. & F. 745.

Where the contract was to take a certain steam tug towing sailing barges a certain distance in a given time, and the engines of the tug proved defective, of which fact neither party had notice, and delay was occasioned thereby and caused loss of profit to the hirer, the court held that the contract being for a specific vessel, there was no implied warranty of reasonable efficiency, and that the plaintiff was without remedy the engines not being shown to be in a worse condition at the time possession was taken than when the contract was made. Robertson v. Amazon Tug & Lighterage Co. L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 596, 51 L. J. Q. B. 68.

From this decision Bramwell, L. J., dissented, holding that there was an implied undertaking that the engines were not defective. Ibid.

Where refuse oil was sold to graziers without description or knowledge that it was to be used for feeding cattle, the court held there was no implied warranty of fitness. Jackson v. Harrison, 2 Post. & F. 782.

Where port wine was sold without sample, as fit to be laid down, and shipped and delivered as "superior old port," but proved sour owing to a deficiency of spirit in bottling, Kelly, C. B., held that there was a warranty of fitness, and Martin Pigott & Cleasby, BB., that there was evidence thereof. Osborne v. Hart, 23 L. T. N. S. 851.

In this last case, however, Martin, B., held that the maxim caveat emptor applied, the sale being of specific goods which might have been examined. Ibid.

In Bigge v. Parkinson, 7 Hurlst. & N. 565, the court held that an express warranty that troop stores would "pass survey of the East India Company's officers" did not do away with the implied warranty of the fitness of the stores for the intended purpose.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Nancy E. WOODRUFF, Admr., etc., of Henry D. Woodruff, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

Silas T. BOWEN.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A fireman who goes into or upon a burning building for the purpose of extinguishing the fire acts under a license given by the law, and not by invitation of the owner, so as to bring himself within the rule as to the owner's duty to have the building safe for those whom he invites there.

2. Keeping a building in a populous city safe for firemen is not a duty of the owner at common law, independent of any statute or ordinance.

3. An ordinance requiring the owner of a dangerous or insecure wall or building to make it safe within twelve hours after notice, does not apply to a building which is safe for the purpose of commerce and trade, but fails by reason of the large quantities of water thrown into and upon it in extinguishing a fire, while it was stored with stationery by a tenant, thus putting it to an extraordinary strain.

(October 20, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death, and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry N. Spaan and William A. Ketcham, for appellant:

"Every man is required to so use his own that he shall not injure another."

Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do.

5 Walt. Act. & Def. § 2, p. 563.

Ordinarily a man may use his own as he pleases; but when he unlawfully works an injury his neighbors have the right to redress.

The cases in which actions have been sought to be maintained for violation of this rule are various, viz.:

a. The most common are those where injuries have been inflicted upon passers-by upon a public highway, for those are the instances in which injuries are most frequently sustained.

b. The next in order are probably those where property or property rights in the vicinity are invaded or injured, and those cases usually come under the head of nuisances.

c. Are the instances where persons have gone upon another's premises by his invitation, express or implied, for the mutual benefit of both parties.

d. Those cases where persons have gone upon another's premises simply by permission, express or implied, without any invitation, and solely for their own accommodation, benefit, or convenience.

These several instances are of parties who, at the time of the injury, are at the place at which they are injured: (1) as a matter of right; (2) not as a matter of right, but as mere licensees; (3) wrongfully.

Decedent was on the building as a matter of right; he was a part of the police power of the city of Indianapolis in the employ of a particular sub-division of the state represented by the city of Indianapolis and in the capacity

NOTE.—The above case seems to be one of first impression on the common-law liability of owners of buildings to keep them safe for firemen who enter in the exercise of their duties for the purpose of extinguishing fire. This is, based on the doctrine of L. R. A.

trine that firemen enter under an implied license, and not under an implied invitation, and while the distinction given by the law is a fine one, the difference in the result is very great.

of a fireman. As such he owed a triple duty : (1) to the public to subdue and prevent the spread of fire to adjacent property to the general injury of the citizens of the city ; (2) to attempt to extinguish, for the protection and benefit of the defendant, the fire which was then raging in his building, and which threatened the entire destruction of the improvements on his ground ; (3) to perform the same office in the interest and for the benefit of the tenant, the Bowen-Merrill Company, as to the stock of goods which it then had on the premises owned by the defendant.

With reference to the Bowen-Merrill Company, he was there exclusively for its benefit, and impliedly at its invitation. Considered with reference to his duty to the public, he was there, first, as a matter of right, and second, as a matter of duty.

From the standpoint of the property holder whose property is being destroyed by the ravages of fire, the fireman comes there for the particular benefit of the particular property holder.

The fireman owed to him personally as the owner of the property the duty of being at such point, either on, in, or about the building as in his judgment or because of the command of his superior officer, was most conducive to a successful effort to subdue and extinguish the fire.

He was there as a matter of right.

Being there as a matter of right, there was owing to him the duty that the places at which he was, should be ordinarily and reasonably safe so far as an ordinarily reasonable and prudent man could make and keep them so, except and except only as to those dangers which he was conclusively presumed to have accepted by engaging in the particularly dangerous employment in which he was occupied. Lafayette v. Allen, 81 Ind. 166; Turner v. Indianapolis, 96 Ind. 51.

The property holder owes a duty to third parties who come upon his premises not as trespassers, or as mere licensees, but as a matter of right and duty.

Proximate cause is that cause which alone or in connection with other agencies ordinarily and reasonably to be expected produces the result complained of.

Proximate cause would seem to be more a question of fact than of law to be decided in each individual case as it may arise, upon which the law is to be laid down by the court but the application should be made by the jury.

Rep. 500; Tarry v. Ashton, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 314.

An ordinarily reasonable and prudent man would regard the danger of fire in a building that he was erecting as so liable to happen as that he should take it into consideration.

The fact that the defendant took out a fire insurance policy was the highest possible declaration that he recognized and conceded the possibility of fire; in the coming of fire he was bound to know that if the fire should attain a sufficient headway, a sufficient amount of water would be thrown upon his feeble building to endanger the life of any one in the vicinity of the fire and he should have made as careful provision for others as he did for himself, and failing to do so, ought not to be heard to insist that it was so remote and impossible as that it could not be regarded as a proximate cause of the injury.

The ordinance duly passed by a municipality is as to the property within the jurisdiction of the municipality and the residents of that city as binding and conclusive as would be a general law of the state enacted by the General Assembly.

The erecting and maintaining of the building upon which the injury was occasioned in the manner in which it was shown to have been erected and maintained was a direct positive violation of the law, and whatever might be the ruling in the absence of any such enactment where a law, whether statute or ordinance, requires a certain thing to be done which has been omitted, and an injury is occasioned thereby, this constitutes actionable negligence for which the party injured may recover.

Willy v. Mulledy, 78 N. Y. 310, 34 Am. Rep. 536; Sisk v. Crump, 112 Ind. 507; Mississinewa Min. Co. v. Patton, 129 Ind. 472.

Messrs. Duncan & Smith and Howland & Howe, for defendant:

If the facts alleged are such as imply an in-vation or impose a duty, that is sufficient without more; if the facts alleged do not imply an invitation or impose a duty, the mere fact that it is alleged that such invitation was extended or such duty existed adds nothing whatever to the force of the pleading.

Gibson v. Leonard, 87 Ill. App. 844; Seymour v. Maddox, 16 Q. B. 326; White v. Phillips, 15 C. B. N. S. 245.

We must first ascertain what duty the defendant in the action owed to the injured party, for where there is no duty, or, if one, it has been performed, there can be no negligence, nor any liability.

Purcell v. English, 86 Ind. 34, 44 Am. Rep. 255; McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126, 26 Am. Rep. 555.

1. The appellee was not guilty of any actionable breach of duty to the decedent, imposed by statute or by municipal ordinance.

It is not claimed that appellee violated any statute, but it is claimed that he was guilty of neglect of a duty imposed upon him by the ordinance referred to.

The ordinance is of an entirely different character from those construed in each of the cases cited by appellant. The duty here is not a certain specific duty like the erection of railings around an opening, the construction of trap doors or fire-escapes.

The city, by this ordinance, has conferred upon the chief fire engineer the duty of determining whether walls are unsafe or not, and of notifying the owner of the repairs to be made, specifying the object of such repairs with reasonable certainty. And it is expressly said that the duty of the owner is to act upon receiving such notice.

2. Whether appellee be regarded as owner or occupant, and whether or not he be deemed to have "invited" the decedent to enter the building in question, he was not guilty of any actionable breach of duty to such decedent.

What is negligence? It is a relative term signifying the absence of due care.

What care is it the duty of one to use in respect to another? It is such care as an ordinarily reasonable and prudent man, under the circumstances of the particular case, as they existed at the time to which the inquiry relates, would be expected to use to avoid the dangers, if any, to be reasonably apprehended.

What dangers should an ordinarily reasonable and prudent man be supposed to apprehend? They are such only as such a man ought reasonably to expect to be, not merely the possible, but the natural and probable, results of the act or omission charged as negligence.

What results ought an ordinarily reasonable and prudent man to expect as the natural and probable results of any particular act or omission? Those which, according to the common experience of mankind, and, in the ordinary course of events, are the natural and usual consequences of similar acts and omissions.

Pollock, Torts, Negligence, *352.

The conduct of the individual charged with negligence must be determined, not in the light of subsequent events, but in the light of the circumstances as they existed at the time of the act or omission charged as negligence. To hold otherwise would be, as declared by an eminent judge, "to say that whenever the world grows wiser it convicts those that came before of negligence."

Men must regulate, and we must judge, their conduct, not by speculations as to what may possibly happen, but by considering what may naturally and reasonably be expected to occur.

The duty of the owner of property to a visitor or guest is the same as that of a master to a servant.

Southcote v. Stanley, 1 Hurlst. & N. 247.

The duty of a master to his servant is that he shall use ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place in which the servant shall exercise his employment, and to provide him with machinery and appliances reasonably calculated and fitted to perform the work for which they are designated.

Sjogren v. Hall, 53 Mich. 274; Hutchinson v. Boston Gas Light Co. 123 Mass. 219; Blythe v. Birmingham Water Works Co. 11 Exch. 781.

Not only is a man not negligent in not anticipating and providing against events extraordinary in and of themselves; but further, he is not negligent in not foreseeing and providing against an unusual and extraordinary combination and collocation of circumstances, no one of which is in and of itself uncommon, the combination of them alone being out of the ordinary.

Appellee was not guilty of negligence in not taking precautions to avoid the consequences of a fire not occurring by reason of his own negligence, although he may be presumed to have contemplated the possibility of a fire occurring, and that if a fire should occur loss of life might result.

Jones v. Granite Mills, 126 Mass. 84, 30 Am. Rep. 661.

3. Whether appellee be regarded as owner or occupant of the building, and whether or not he be deemed to have "invited" the decedent to enter it, the appellee's negligence, if he was guilty of any, was not the proximate cause of the injuries sued for.

In cases involving mere negligence the general rule is that the party guilty of it is only responsible for such consequences as, according to the experience of mankind, are natural and usual and ought, therefore, to have been foreseen.

Even with respect to positive wrongs, the law is not an avenging Nemesis, relentlessly pursuing the wrongdoer for all time and to the ends of the earth to punish him for the remote consequences of his fault.

Sharp v. Powell, L. R. 7 C. P. 258; Putnam v. Broadway & S. A. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 106, 14 Am. Rep. 190.

In such a case as this, we determine whether the defendant's act or omission was or was not the proximate cause of the accident, not by determining whether it contributed in some degree to the accident, nor by determining whether it, in connection with other events, produced the accident, nor by determining whether, without it, the accident would not have happened, nor by determining whether the intervening events were of an extraordinary character, nor by determining whether they were few or many; but, considering all the events that intervened, we determine whether or not the defendant at the time of his act or omission, which is charged as negligence, ought, as a reasonably prudent man, to have foreseen that such other events would probably intervene and combine with his act or omission to produce the result which followed.

4. Whether appellee be regarded as owner or occupant of the building, the decedent entered it as a mere licensee and appellee was not guilty of any actionable breach of duty to such licensee.

A license given by law imposes no greater liability upon either landlord or tenant, and especially upon the former, than would be imposed by an express or implied license given by either.

Gibson v. Leonard, 87 Ill. App. 344.

A mere licensee has some rights. The landowner cannot shoot him. He cannot lawfully set spring guns and traps for him. The licensor is liable, even to a licensee, if he is guilty of what in the civil law is termed "dolus." But beyond this the licensor owes the licensee no duty, certainly not the duty of active diligence, to see that no harm come to him, and when the latter, without any invitation and pursuant to a mere license, enters the former's premises, he takes the risk of whatever dangers may be there.

5. The building in question being in the exclusive occupation and control of appellee's tenant,—the Bowen-Merrill Company—the decedent cannot be deemed to have entered by appellant's invitation or license, and hence appellee is not liable.

There are authorities of great weight expressly holding that even where the defects complained of constitute a nuisance and existed at the date of the lease, the landlord is not liable to a third person injured thereby unless he has covenanted to repair.

Wood, Land. & T. 2d ed. § 536, p. 1290; Pretty v. Bickmore, L. R. 8 C. P. 401; Gwinnett v. Eamer, L. R. 10 C. P. 658; Leonard v. Storer, 115 Mass. 86, 15 Am. Rep. 76.

The tenant may stand, if he chooses, upon his strict legal right as virtual owner during his term, and refuse to let the landlord enter.

Butler v. Cushing, 48 Hun, 521; Stocker v. Planet Building Soc. 27 Week. Rep. 877.

It is the occupier who is prima facie liable to third persons for damages arising from any defect.

Kirby v. Boylston Market Assn. 14 Gray, 249, 74 Am. Dec. 682.

Nor could the appellant maintain this action against the landlord even if he had covenanted with his tenant to repair. Third parties are strangers to the covenants between the landlord and the tenant, and cannot maintain an action based upon such covenants either against the landlord (Burdick v. Cheadle, 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767; Robbins v. Jones, 15 O. B. N. S. 221-240), or against the lessee.

A landlord, not being in possession, and not having the right to enter himself, there can be no such thing as an implied invitation or license from him.

Colley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action in the Marion county circuit court, brought by the appellant against the appellee, for actionable negligence resulting in the death of the appellant's decedent. The suit was brought for the benefit of the widow and children of the deceased. The complaint is in two paragraphs, to each of which the court sustained a demurrer. This ruling of the circuit court is assigned here as error. The able counsel for the appellant has prepared a synopsis of the complaint, the correctness of which is not disputed by the appellee, and for that reason we adopt it as a correct statement of the contents of the complaint. It is as follows: The first paragraph alleges that the decedent, Henry D. Woodruff, was in the employ of the city of Indianapolis as a fireman, and as such belonged to the organization known as the fire department of the city, which in turn was composed of a body of men duly appointed and acting under a code of rules, whose duty it was to put out any and all fires occurring within the limits of the city, the apparatus therefor being furnished by the city, and the compensation to the firemen and the cost of the apparatus being paid out of the city treasury. That as such firemen the deceased and his comrades were bound, whenever the alarm of fire was sounded, to attend and do all in their power to put out the fire, and while so doing were under the direction of the officers of the fire department. That on the 17th of March, 1890, a fire broke out in a building owned by the defendant, situate on Washington street, and deceased, with other firemen, in response to the alarm, went to the building to put it out. In attempting to so do, under the control and command of the chief of the fire department and his assistants, in the discharge of his duties as fireman, and under the orders of the officers of the fire department, he had gone upon the roof of the building, and while there in the course of his employment, it being a proper place for him to be at the time when the accident occurred, and while he believed, and had reason to believe, that it was reasonably safe for him to be on the roof in company with the other firemen, the roof and other portions of the building, without warning, gave way, and precipitated the deceased and eleven other firemen into the basement of the building, midst the falling and burning debris of the roof, which caused the death of the deceased and his eleven comrades. That he was killed without any fault or negligence on his part, but because of the negligence of the defendant, as follows: The defendant, for a long time prior to the 17th of March, had been a resident of the city, had owned the building, and, in common with other citizens of the city, enjoyed the benefits and protection afforded by the fire department. At the time, and for a long time before that, he knew and had known that it was the duty of the deceased and his comrades to respond to alarms of fire, and to attempt to put out any fire that might break out in his building. The building was situate in the business center of the city, and in its most frequented portion, and defendant knew that it was in constant danger of catching fire, either by accident or design. The defendant as a resident of the city, and as a constituent part of the government, and as entitled to the protection of the fire department, invited the decedent and his comrades, in their capacity as firemen, into and onto the building. That at some time prior to the fire the defendant, as the owner of the building, had leased the same to the Bowen-Merrill Company, who were in possession at the time of the fire under the lease, but long before then, and before the execution of the lease, the defendant had changed, enlarged, and repaired his building; but when he built it, and at the time of the accident, it had a substantial-appearing iron front, and the deceased believed, and had reason to believe, that the building was as substantial as it appeared, but in fact it was a remodeled building, made much larger and higher than it was originally, and when defendant remodeled and rebuilt it he did not increase the strength of the foundation walls, and the whole building, back of the imposing iron front thereon, was insufficiently built and insecure, while having the outward appearance of strength to the deceased and others whose duty called them to the same. During the time while the building was being occupied by the Bowen-Merrill Company as a tenant of the defendant, the defendant was the president and chief executive officer of the company, and owned $35,000 out of the total capital of $80,000, and during the entire continuance of the lease the right was conceded to him by the company to come upon the premises, and to make thereon such improvements and repairs as he might deem necessary for the protection and preservation of the building. That in remodeling the building it was built unsafely,—the walls not strong enough, the foundation not sufficient to meet the exigencies and requirements for which the building was intended and used. That defendant knew when he leased the building that the company would place, and did place, in it a stock of stationery, books, etc., and he also knew that the building was not strong enough to bear the weight of such stock. He also knew at the time when he executed the lease and at the time when the deceased was killed, that the building was not strong enough, and was so insecurely built that it would not stand the weight of the stock and any additional strain that might be put upon it in case of fire by the weight of the water which would be thrown upon the stock to put out the fire, and at the time of the fire the weight of the stock and the weight of the water because of the weak and insufficient character of the building and foundation walls, gave way. That the building was so weak, insecure, and unsafe as to be dangerous to all who might go about it in case any additional weight might be placed upon the same as in case of fire. At the time of the death of the deceased, defendant was receiving rent for the building. Deceased did not know of the unsafe and negligent construction and condition of the building at and before it fell. That deceased left a widow and four children under nineteen years of age. The second paragraph thereof states substantially the same facts as the first, with the following additions: The building was 35 feet in front and 120 in depth. That it had been on fire several times during the last ten years, and to secure himself from loss by fire at the time of the occurrence of the fire, and for a long time before that, defendant had carried $12,000 fire insurance on the building. That on the 28th of April, 1873, the city of Indianapolis passed an ordinance in which it was provided, among other things: "It shall be unlawful for any person to construct, erect, or maintain any unsafe, insecure, and dangerous wall, building, or structure within the limits of this city, and it shall be the duty of all persons owning premises upon which there is any dangerous, unsafe, and insecure wall or building, to make the same safe and secure, either by properly repairing the same or by rebuilding the same within twelve (12) hours after receiving notice from the chief fire engineer.

Each and every day in which such wall or building is permitted to remain unsafe, dangerous, and insecure after the receipt of notice as herein provided, shall be held and taken as a separate and distinct violation of this ordinance, and as such punished. . . . Sec. 6. Any wall, structure, or building likely to fall, or to take fire, shall be taken and deemed to be unsafe and insecure within the meaning of this ordinance. All brick walls less than one foot in thickness, and which form a part or are intended to form part of a building more than two stories in height, shall be deemed unsafe and insecure." This ordinance was in force from its passage until after the fire, and deceased in his lifetime, and the defendant, knew that it was in force. When the defendant became the owner of the premises, they were occupied by two store-rooms, two stories in height, with walls on either side, and a continuous wall in the center contributed to the support of the roof and floors sufficiently to support the building in its then condition. After defendant became the owner, and after the building had been in existence for over forty years as originally built, the defendant, being desirous of increasing the capacity and area of his premises without materially increasing the expense, added two stories to the two stories then existing, taking out the center wall above the basement, and without strengthening or adding to the capacity or strength of the east and west walls, or without adding anything to the foundation under the center walls, and supporting the new building thus erected in the center with iron and wooden pillars, upon which, in connection with the side and end walls, the floors of the second and third stories rested, and by which they were all supported. That by the manner of construction the smaller weight before had been distributed throughout the entire length of the foundation of the center wall, but was very greatly increased by the additional size and weight of the building, and, by the substitution of columns for a solid wall, the added weight, instead of being distributed along the entire length, as it had been theretofore, was concentrated upon a few spots upon which the pillars rested, thus producing an unequal pressure at these places, and diminishing the bearing strength of the foundation upon which the pillars rested. That in making this improvement the defendant took away the original front wall, which indicated to the observer the character of the building, and substituted a substantial, strong, and imposing iron front for the entire height of the four stories, and thus gave to the building, which was in fact weak and insufficient to bear any great weight, the appearance of being a sound, substantial, and permanent improvement, capable of sustaining not only the building and its contents, but of being safe in case of fire or other accident which would cause unusual weight to be borne by the building. That it was known to the defendant at the time of the fire that the building and its walls, more especially the foundation under the center columns, was unsafe, insecure, and dangerous, and likely to fall and take fire, but that was not known to, but was concealed from, the deceased and the officers of the fire department, and they were prevented from ascertaining the defective, insufficient, insecure, unsafe, and dangerous character of the foundation because of the fact that it was underneath the floor, and not to be seen by any one entering the premises in the ordinary course of business, and the deceased and the officers of the fire department were thrown off their guard, and prevented from ascertaining the condition of the building, walls, and foundation, by the outward appearance of strength and sufficiency given to it by the iron front; and ever since the remodeling, rebuilding, and enlargement of the building upon his premises the defendant had continued to maintain it in the unsafe, insecure, and dangerous manner named, contrary to the provisions of the ordinance, well knowing that with any extra weight as in case of any accident, or in case of fire, it would be insufficient to stand the strain, and so fall. When the fire broke out in the building, water was thrown upon the stock in order to put out the fire; and the weight of the stock, together with the weight of the water, and the unsafe, insufficient, insecure, and dangerous character of the building walls, and especially the foundation walls, caused it to give way without being weakened or impaired at all in their bearing strength by the fire which was burning.

It is contended by the appellant: First, that the owner of a building in the heart of a populous city owes it as a duty at common law, independent of any statute or municipal ordinance, to keep such building safe for purposes other than the requirements of trade and commerce; that such duty is comprehensive enough to embrace the safety of firemen and other officers whose duty, in the event of a contingency, may require them to be in and about the building; and that the complaint in this case shows a breach of this duty on the part of the appellee, resulting, proximately, in the death of the appellant's decedent. Second, that it appears from the allegations in the complaint that the appellee maintained the building therein described in violation of the ordinance of the city of Indianapolis therein set out, the immediate result of which was the death of the appellant's decedent, and that he is for that reason liable for the resulting damages. On the other hand, it is contended by the appellee Bowen—First, that, whether he is to be regarded as the owner or occupant of the building described in the complaint, the decedent entered it as a mere licensee, and that he was not guilty of any actionable breach of duty to him; second, that whether he be regarded as the owner or occupant of such building, and whether he be deemed to have invited the decedent to enter the building, he was not guilty of any actionable breach of duty to him; third, that he was not guilty of any actionable breach of duty to the decedent imposed by any municipal ordinance; fourth, that the negligence set up in the complaint was not the proximate cause of the death of the appellant's decedent; fifth, that, the building described in the complaint being in the exclusive possession of the appellee's tenant, the decedent cannot be deemed to have entered by his invitation or license, and hence he is not liable.

It is conceded that the decedent, at the time of his death, was lawfully in the appellee's building. It is important, however, to determine whether he was there under an invitation from the appellee, either express or implied, or whether he was there as a mere licensee. This is important for the reason that the appellee would own him a much higher duty if he was there by invitation than he would owe him if he entered under no other authority than that of a licensee. It is true, the complaint alleges that the appellant, "as a resident of the city, and as a constituent part of this government, and as entitled to the protection of the fire department, invited the decedent and his comrades, in their capacity as firemen, into and onto the building." But we do not understand this allegation as intending to convey the idea that any personal or express invitation was given. The pleader evidently intended, we think, to charge that there existed a general implied invitation from the citizens of the city, including the appellee, to the firemen belonging to the fire department, to enter their houses in case of a conflagration, for the purpose of extinguishing the fire. This allegation, therefore, does not enable us to determine whether the deceased was in the house of the appellee by invitation or as a licensee. Judge Cooley, in his valuable work on Torts, divides licensees into three classes. Of the third class he says: "The third class of licensees comprehends those cases in which the law gives permission to enter a man's premises. This permission has no necessary connection with the owners' interest, and is always given on public grounds. An instance is where a fire breaks out in a city. Here the public authorities, and even private individuals, may enter upon adjacent premises, as they may find it necessary or convenient in their efforts to extinguish or arrest the spread of the flames. The law of overruling necessity licenses this, and will not suffer the owner of a lot to stand at its borders, and exclude those who would use his premises as vantage ground to stay the conflagration. Indeed, it sometimes becomes necessary to destroy whole blocks of buildings to stop the spread of fire, and the sufferer, instead of looking to the officials who command it, or the parties who execute their commands, must seek redress at the hands of the state itself, and accept what the state awards." Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 367. We think Judge Cooley, in the above extract, states the law correctly. It does not appear from the complaint before us that the deceased entered the house of the appellee, where he lost his life, by invitation, either express or implied, but it does appear that he entered under a license given by law for the purpose of extinguishing a fire raging therein at the time. It is unnecessary, under this state of facts, to inquire what duty the appellee would have owed the deceased had he entered the building under an invitation, or to inquire whether the premises were in the sole possession of a tenant of the appellee, as the case must turn upon the duty which the appellee owed the deceased at the time he entered under a license given by the law. We do not believe it can be successfully maintained that the appellee owed to the deceased, who entered his premises under a license created by an overruling necessity, a higher duty than if he had entered under an express license granted by him. In the case of Reardon v. Thompson, 149 Mass. 267, it was said: "No doubt a bare licensee has some rights. The landowner cannot shoot him." He cannot lawfully set spring traps for him. The licensor is liable, even to a licensee, if he is guilty of what the civil law terms "dolus." But beyond this the licensor owes the licensee no duty,—certainly not the duty of active diligence to see that no harm come to him; and when the latter, without any invitation, and pursuant to a mere license, enters the former's premises, he takes the risk of whatever dangers may be there. The law is so laid down in the text-books, and is established by a multitude of decisions. Mr. Pollock, in his work on Torts, (*426.) says: "In the language of continental jurisprudence there is no question of culpa between a gratuitous licensee and the licensor, as regards the safe condition of the property to which the license applies. Nothing short of 'dolus' will make the licensor liable." To substantially the same effect are Ray, Neg. 28; Parker v. Portland Pub. Co. 69 Me. 178, 31 Am. Rep. 262; Pittsburgh, Fr. W. & C. R. Co. v. Bingham, 29 Ohio St. 869, 23 Am. Rep. 751; Larmore v. Crown Point Iron Co. 101 N. Y. 391, 54 Am. Rep. 718; Victory v. Baker, 67 N. Y. 866; Thiele v. McManus, 3 Ind. App. 182; Lary v. Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. 78 Ind. 323, 41 Am. Rep. 572; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Griffin, 100 Ind. 221, 50 Am. Rep. 783; Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 58 Am. Rep. 65; Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Barnhart, 115 Ind. 399.

The question of the liability of the property owner to a mere licensee was very recently fully considered by this court in the case of Paris v. Hoberg (Ind. Sup.) 33 N. E. Rep. 1028. In that case, after a careful review of the authorities, the conclusion was reached that one entering a store on his own private business, by a way not used by customers, was a mere licensee, and that the owner of the store owed him no duty. We think that the authorities fully establish the rule that the licensor owes to the mere licensee no duty except that of abstaining from any positive wrongful act which may result in his injury, and that the licensee takes all risks as to the safe condition of the premises upon which he enters. To the question now under discussion, decisions based upon express statutes or ordinances, as well as decisions based upon the fact that the injured party entered the premises under an invitation, express or implied, are not applicable. We are of the opinion that the owner of a building in a populous city does not owe it as a duty, at common law, independent of any statute or ordinance, to keep such building safe for firemen, or other officers who in a contingency may enter the same under a license conferred by law. It seems to be settled, however, that such duty may be imposed either by statute or by an ordinance adopted for that purpose. Willy v. Mulledy, 78 N. Y. 810, 34 Am. Rep. 536; Parker v. Barnard, 185 Mass. 116, 46 Am. Rep. 450; Ryan v. Thomson, 6 Jones & S. 133; Luddington v. Miller, 4 Jones & S. 1.

It remains, therefore, to inquire whether the appellee is liable for the injury of which complaint is made, by reason of the ordinance of the city of Indianapolis set out in the complaint. In the case of Willy v. Mulledy, supra, a statute provided that the owners of a designated class of buildings in the city of Brooklyn should provide the same with fire escapes. It was held that this statute was intended for the benefit of tenants, and the owner of a building of the class named who failed to comply with the statute was liable to a tenant who was injured by reason of such failure. In the case of Parker v. Barnard, supra, there was a statute which provided that, in any store or building in the city of Boston in which there was placed a hoistway or elevator hole, such hoistway or elevator hole should be protected by a good and substantial railing, and good and sufficient trapdoors with which to close the same, and that the trapdoors should be kept closed at all times except when in actual use by the occupant of the building. It was held that this statute was intended for the benefit of all persons lawfully entering such a building, and that for this reason a police officer who entered after night in the discharge of his official duty, and was injured by reason of a failure to comply with the statute, might recover, although he was a mere licensee. In the case of Ryan v. Thomson, supra, there was an ordinance of the city of New York similar to the statute mentioned in the case of Parker v. Barnard, and it was held that such ordinance was intended for the benefit of firemen, police officers, and others who in the performance of their duties might be called upon to enter such houses after night, and that a policeman injured by reason of a failure to comply with the ordinance might recover. In the case of Luddington v. Miller, supra, a statute of the United States provided for private bonded warehouses. The statutes and the regulations of the treasury department place such warehouses under the control and management of the warehousemen who owned the same, so far as the supervision and management of the hatchways were concerned. It was held that if such warehouseman negligently left open a hatchway in a passageway over which a custom officer would pass in the discharge of his duties at such house, by reason of which the officer was injured, he might recover for such injury. The ordinance under immediate consideration is fully set out in the complaint, a synopsis of which is above set forth. There is nothing in the ordinance to indicate that the common council, at the time it was adopted, had in mind the safety of firemen in case of a fire occurring in the city. It was evidently its purpose to protect the citizens and those whose business required them to be in the vicinity of walls and buildings liable to fall and do them injury, and also to protect the city against fire by reason of structures liable at any time to take fire. That the common council did not have in mind the kind of wall described in the complaint is evidenced by the fact that the ordinance in question requires the owner of any dangerous, unsafe, or insecure wall or building to make the same safe and secure either by properly repairing the same, or by rebuilding the same within twelve hours after receiving notice from the chief fire engineer. Such provision, together with other provisions in the ordinance, indicate, we think, that the common council was legislating with reference to walls and buildings in immediate danger of falling, or in immediate danger of taking fire. In this case, so far as it appears from the facts alleged in the complaint, the appellee had erected a building which, under ordinary circumstances, was reasonably safe for the purposes of commerce and trade. It became unsafe only by reason of the fact that it was stored with stationery by a tenant, and by reason of the fact that in an extraordinary emergency large quantities of water were thrown into and upon the building, thus putting it to an extraordinary strain. We do not think the ordinance before us was intended to apply to a building of this character. The appellee, in the construction of his building, was not, in our opinion, bound to anticipate extraordinary events, but, if he constructed a building which was ordinarily safe under ordinary circumstances, he was not acting in violation of the terms of this ordinance. This case has been ably argued orally, in open court, and briefed on both sides with unusual care and ability; and after a careful consideration of all that has been said, and a careful examination of all the authorities cited, we have been forced to the conclusion that the complaint before us does not state facts sufficient to hold the appellee liable for the injury set up in the complaint, either under the common law or the ordinances of the city of Indianapolis. It follows from this conclusion that the circuit court did not err in its ruling, and that its judgment should be affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

The word "pew" is said to be derived from the Dutch "puye," and to signify "a seat enclosed in a church." Brumfitt v. Roberts, L. R. 5 C. P. 224; Johnson's Dict.

The right to separate seats or pews in a church did not exist in England, except in the case of the favored few, before the Reformation, all parishioners having the right to use the body of the church; subsequently, however, the right to them was granted by the bishop or ordinary by means of a faculty the rights under which were heard in the spiritual courts alone. 1 Burn's Eccl. Law, title Church, chap. 7; Crabbe, Real Prop. § 4, pl. 90, § 10, pl. 481, 482.

Corven's Case, 2 Coke, 105, Frazer's ed., was about the earliest case upon this question. There the court held that any person having a house or land in the parish time out of mind, and a seat in an aisle of the church maintained at his own charges might have a writ of prohibition against the bishop if the latter dispossessed him. But that the ordinary could decide all questions arising out of seats in the body of a church.

In 10 Jac. it was resolved in the Star Chamber, that if a man had a house in any parish, and time out of mind he and all those whose estate he had had used to have a certain pew in the church, if the ordinary displaced him he had a prohibition; but he must claim it as belonging to the house. Ibid.

At common law there was no property in, nor right to sell or let, a pew or seat in the body of a parochial church or chapel. Brumfitt v. Roberts, supra.

By the general law and of common right, pews

All parishioners are entitled to be seated, orderly and conveniently, so as best to provide for the accommodation of all. Ibid.; Re Cathedral Church of St. Columb, Londonderry, 8 L. T. N. S. 861.

But every parishioner has not a right to a pew in the parish church. Re Cathedral Church of St. Columb, Londonderry, supra.

The freehold is generally in the parson, the inhabitants having the right to use the church for Divine worship. Brumfitt v. Roberts, supra.

The pew owners' interest is not such as to vest the freehold in any portion of the soil in him so as to give him the right to vote; but only an easement, or qualified right to occupy and enjoy the pew for the purpose of attending service. Ibid.; Hinde v. Charlton, L. R. 2 C. P. 104.

It is essentially a right to use it for the services of the church, and at times when it is open for use, subject to the regulations of the church; and there is no right of access to it or to use it for other purposes or in any other manner. Brumfitt v. Roberts, L. R. 5 C. P. 224.

It may be annexed to a house by a faculty, or by prescription, which supposes a faculty, and may be transferred with the messuage. Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 432; *Yard v. But it cannot be annexed by prescription to anything but a house or messuage; the occupier of the house and not the owner of the estate being alone entitled to its use. Woollocombe v. Ouldrige, 3 Add. Eccl. Rep. 1.

So the mere occupancy of a house did not of itself give the right to a pew as they were not appurtenant to the land. Pettman v. Bridger, 1 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 516.

Where the right to a pew exists as annexed to a messuage by prescription it runs with the occupancy of the house and cannot be severed from it. Re Cathedral Church of St. Columb, Londonderry, 8 L. T. N. S. 861.

The possessory right is only coextensive with actual possession, abandonment causing the right to cease and determine. Woollocombe v. Ouldrige, supra.

5. The archbishop, who has title to the soil on which a Roman Catholic Church stands, has no greater rights in respect to the demolition of a pew, owned by an individual, therein than an organized religious corporation of any other denomination would have by reason of its ownership of the church.

(November 28, 1893.)

REPORT by the Superior Court of Middlesex County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court after verdict in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful destruction of certain pews in the St. John's Roman Catholic Church at East Cambridge, which were the property of the plaintiff. Verdict set aside.

In March, 1842, property was conveyed to the Roman Catholic bishop of Boston, upon which the church in question was erected. The bishop afterwards executed the following unsealed instrument:

"Know all men by these presents, that in consideration of the sum of one hundred and seven, 50-100 dollars, paid by John McGinley for the use of the Roman Catholic Church of St. John's, East Cambridge, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, we, the undersigned, do hereby sell and convey unto the said John McGinley a pew in the above church, in the north aisle, No. 58, to have and to hold to the said John McGinley and his heirs forever, on the following conditions, to wit: that he and they shall regularly pay, or cause to be paid, a quarterly contribution of two dollars fifty

A person having a possessory title only, claiming the right as annexed to the house by prescription, must prove repairs at his own expense if they have been necessary. Pettman v. Bridger, supra; Fuller v. Lane, 2 Add. Ecol. Rep. 419; Walter v. Gunner, 1 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 822; Kenrick v. Taylor, 1 Wils. 826; Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 481; Woolloombe v. Ouldrige, supra; Crisp v. Martin, L. R. 2 Prob. Div. 15; Churton v. Frewen, L. R. 2 Eq. 684, 85 L. J. Ch. 682; Knapp v. St. Mary, Willesden, 2 Hob. Ecol. Rep. 368.

When a person has a pew annexed to his house, he may have an action on the case against any one disturbing him. Griffith v. Matthews, 5 T. R. 298; Husey v. Leyton, Eastern Term, 10 Jac.

The distribution of seats rests with the church wardens as the officers, and subject to the control, of the ordinary, neither the minister nor the vestry having any right whatever to interfere with them in seating and arranging the parishioners as often erroneously supposed. Fuller v. Lane, supra; even though a cathedral. Re Cathedral Church of St. Columb, Londonderry, supra.

Church wardens have a discretionary power to appropriate the pews in the church among the parishioners, and may remove persons intruding upon seats already appropriated. Raynolds v. Monkton, 2 Mood. & R. 864.

A faculty of a pew to a man and his heirs is bad, as it may belong to a party not a parishioner. Byerley v. Winduss, 7 Dowl. & R. 564, 5 Barn. & C. 1.

The right to a pew in the body of a church cannot be acquired otherwise than by prescription by a nonparishioner, whether extra-parochial or resident in another parish. Ibid.

But a pew in the body of a church may be apportioned to a house out of the parish by prescription. Lousley v. Hayward, 1 Younge & J. 569; Davis v. Wt. Forrest, 14.

Presumptive evidence of a prescriptive right to a pew may arise from the uninterrupted possession of a pew in the chancel for thirty years, as against a wrongdoer, but is subject to rebuttal by proof of its non-existence those many years back. Griffith v. Matthews, 5 T. R. 298.

Where the plaintiff claimed possession of a pew for thirty-six years, as appurtenant to a messuage acquiesced in by the defendant, the court held there was good presumptive evidence of a faculty. Rogers v. Brooks, 1 T. R. 481, n; Phillips v. Halliday, App. Cas. [1891] 228, where the plaintiff had repaired, occupied, and kept it locked for several 22 L. R. A.

years, even though the original possession was acquired in a manner giving no legal title.

In case of an interrupted prescription, a faculty, by reason of long undisturbed possession, will not be presumed by the jury. Morgan v. Curtis, 3 Mann. & R. 889.

A pew door hung upon hinges and removable without interfering with the staple is not part of the freehold. Mant v. Collins, 15 L. J. Q. B. 248.

In Woolloombe v. Ouldrige, 3 Add. Ecol. Rep. 1, the court held that ordinaries were bound not to issue faculties appropriating pews to individuals, except under special circumstances.

It does not, however, create such a right in the freehold as will create a right to vote or to be placed upon the county register of voters. Hinde v. Charlton, L. R. 2 C. P. 104; Greenway v. Hockin, L. R. 5 C. P. 235; Brumfit v. Roberts, Id. 224.

Where trustees were empowered by statute to remove and rebuild a chapel and appropriate the pews to subscribers to the building who were deemed proprietors, the pews being vested in them and their heirs forever, the court held, in the absence of proof as to who the real owners of the freehold were, that the proprietors had not such a title as gave them a right to a county vote. Greenway v. Hockin, supra.

No action can be maintained in an ecclesiastical court for the allotment of pews except the building be duly consecrated. Battiscombe v. Eve, 9 Jur. N. S. 210.

It would seem, however, that in the case of a cathedral which is not a parish church the seat can alone be allotted by the bishop. Re Cathedral Church of St. Columb, Londonderry, 8 L. T. N. S. 861.

Where it was proved that the pew in question had been one of three adjoining ones, used under one claim in respect of an ancient messuage, proof of repairs to one pew was held sufficient evidence of repairs. Pepper v. Barnard, 12 L. J. Q. B. 861.

But each case must be governed by its own circumstances in relation to the amount of evidence required. Ibid.

The right to a pew may be apportioned as where the pew was granted by faculty in respect of a dwelling house which was afterwards divided into two houses, the court holding that the occupier of one part had a right to some part of the pew and might maintain an action against a wrongdoer. Harris v. Drowe, 2 Barn. & Ad. 164.

In the Roman Catholic Church, the bare possession of a pew, without title, will justify the occupier in defending, by force, the possession against cents at least. And in case of a default of payment of the said contribution, during more than one year, then thirty days after notice given, the said pew may be entered, and taken from said grantee, his heirs or assigns, by said grantors, their assigns, or any person or persons acting under them, and shall be sold and disposed of, as said grantors or their assigns shall think fit, the present deed and conveyance notwithstanding, which shall thenceforth be void and of no effect. And the residue of the amount of the sale, after having deducted the sum due and charges, shall belong to the said John McGinley, Felix McClurt, or his heirs."

The title to this pew subsequently became vested in the plaintiff, and the plaintiff's title to the other pew was derived under a similar instrument. Defendant is a Roman Catholic priest and was placed in charge of the St. John's Parish, with special directions from the bishop to build a new church, the old edifice having become too small for the needs of the congregation. Ground was secured and the church was built, after which it was decided to use the old edifice for general purposes connected with the church work, and to hold no more services in it. For the purpose of making the changes necessary to fit the building for its new use, the pews were removed therefrom and the woodwork was sold or destroyed.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. M. M. Weston and R. D. Weston-Smith, for plaintiff:

The nature of the property acquired by the plaintiff, and his title thereto, must be determined by the laws of the land. The laws of the Roman Catholic Church are mere matters of discipline which cannot be enforced in our courts.

No one has a right to injure or take down the wood or other material of which the pew, as a visible object, consists; the owner has an exclusive right to occupy it, whenever the church is used for public worship, and it would seem that this is the owner's strict legal right whenever the building is used for purposes other than that of public worship.

The ownership in or the control over, a pew is forbidden to a layman by the canon law of the Roman Catholic Church, yet where a church was erected by means of a subscription expressed to be for the building of a "Catholic chapel," it was held to be a question of fact and not of law whether the signers to such paper recognized or adopted such law upon which parol evidence was admissible to show their intention to have the choice of pews as their own property in severalty. *O'Hear v. A widow has a right in action merely in a pew, and until dower is assigned her second husband has no interest therein. Branson v. St. Peter's Church, 7 N. Y. Legal Obs. 561.

Where a pew was "granted and sold" to the deceased owner his heirs and assigns forever, the court held that as under the statute the deed would be void as an absolute conveyance in fee, the trustees not having the power to create such an estate, it operated as a conveyance of the right to occupy for the purposes of divine service an estate in the nature of a leasehold. Ibid.

In Gamble's Succession, 23 La. Ann. 2, the court applied the rule laid down in article 470 [462] of the Code. Incorporeal things, consisting only in a right, are not of themselves strictly susceptible of the quality of movables or immovables; nevertheless, they are placed in one or the other of these classes, according to the subject to which they apply and the rules hereinafter established.

In Colby v. Northfield & Tilton Cong. Soc., 68 N. H. 63, where the meeting house had been repaired and altered with the assent of the society and the location of the pews changed by the holders, the court held that an equitable assignment by a committee, of the new pews among the holders, pursuant to a vote of the society, was valid.

c. In Pennsylvania.

The interest or title in or to a pew can hardly be said to be property at all in the strict sense of the term, it being a mere easement enjoyed for a particular purpose. Curry v. Trustees of First Presby. Church of Erie, 2 Pittsb. 40.

It is a right that is entirely peculiar, yet a sort of interest in real estate. Church v. Wells, 24 Pa. 249.

In its nature it is scarcely divisible among heirs, and can scarcely be said to be the subject of an as-all the conditions and limitations incident to such property. If the edifice becomes useless by dilapidation, or is destroyed by fire, or if from age, decay, or other injury the house has to be rebuilt in the same place, or from some necessary cause the location be changed, the pew holder has no claim either in law or equity.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's rights must be determined independently of the statutes relating to the power of parishes or proprietors of meeting houses to take down meeting houses and destroy pews. Those statutes apply to proprietors of meeting houses who have organized as corporations, and the powers given therein are to be exercised by the corporations. Pub. Stat. chap. 88, § 27 et seq. There are also statutes providing specially how Roman Catholic churches may become incorporated (Pub. Stat. chap. 88, §§ 48, 50; Stat. 1879, chap. 108); but it does not tion of partition or ejectment, or of a decree of sale by the orphans' court for the payment of debts. Ibid.

As property, it is so conditional and impermanent that it cannot be called real estate, and must pass to the personal representatives. Ibid.

Yet from its nature it would not pass to the personal representatives for use. Ibid.

It passes to the personal representatives merely for sale, as part of the assets, and they sell it subject to its burdens. Ibid.

A pew rent is not a rent in the usual legal application of the term, for it does not issue out of a corporeal hereditament, and is no charge upon the property, except by virtue of the very ordinary provisions made by the congregation, that the pew may be sold for rent. Ibid.

Rent accruing due after the owner's decease can only be obtained by the remedy provided by the church itself in the sale of the pew, or by resort to those who actually occupy it. Ibid.

The executor is not personally bound to pay pew rent except according to his contract. Ibid.

The family may hold it together, and if they do, the executor cannot be charged with a devastavit in not selling it. Ibid.

Where a church charter which provided that subscribers and others thereafter admitted or subscribing should form the corporation, and that any member contributing to the support of the church, a year prior to the election about to be held, a certain sum for a pew or a portion of a pew was entitled to vote, and subsequently the pews were made free by proclamation from the pulpit the church expenses being afterwards defrayed out of the congregation's contributions, the court held that the renting or holding of a pew was not essential to membership the change being no infraction of the constitution. Com. v. Morrison, 18 Phila. 126.

The right does not give the holder the privilege of changing and decorating the pew according to his fancy, or of cutting it down and carrying it away. Church v. Wells, supra.

The same principles are declared in Craig v. First Presby. Church of Pittsburgh, 88 Pa. 51, 32 Am. Rep. 417; and in Kincaid's App. 66 Pa. 411, 5 Am. Rep. 377.

It cannot be used for purposes outside of those prescribed by the resolutions, by-laws, and regulations of the association under which it is held. Curry v. Trustees First Presby. Church of Erie, 2 Pittsb. 40.

A pew right is not of such a character as to prevent an absolute sale of the church edifice, either by contract or by judicial process. Church v. Wells, supra.

d. Conditions attached.

The doctrine, that conditions against alienation in a conveyance in fee simple are void, has never been held to be applicable to conveyances of pews. French v. Old South Soc. in Boston, 106 Mass. 479.

Where, upon a sale of pews, a clause in the conditions restrained the sale or gift thereof, and provided that the same was to descend in right only to such relation as would be his heir-at-law, provided the latter belonged to the church, the court held that the purchaser became entitled to a qualified fee. Heeney v. Trustees of St. Peter's Church, 2 Edw. Ch. 603, 6 L. ed. 623.

So where the conditions of sale provided for payment of an amount down, and extended the balance in certain portions with a forfeiture of the first amount in case of default, the court held that the defendant purchasing thereunder and not making the subsequent payments, acquired no title, but only a right to obtain one by deed on complying with the terms. First Parish in Quincy v. Spear, 15 Pick. 144.

In such a case the pew holder is only a tenant at will or from year to year. Ibid.

Where, by the conditions of the deed, the pew was forfeited for nonpayment of taxes due for more than a year, it was held that the corporation had the right, upon a sale, to deduct the taxes due at that time including those that had been due for a less period. Mussey v. Bulfinch Street Soc. 1 Cush. 148.

Again where the by-laws of an incorporated religious society composed exclusively of pew holders, who held the freehold, prescribed a condition in the deeds of the pews forfeiting them upon the members leaving without offering them at a given price, the court held it was valid, not repugnant to the grant nor against perpetuities. French v. Old South Soc. in Boston, supra.

And it is a breach of such a condition if such pew owner ceases to worship or to attend the meetings of the society or to act and regard himself as a member, and joins another, without making or offering to sell at such fixed price, even if section 4, chap. 20, of Rev. Stat., is not applicable to the case. Ibid.

A pew holder who, without any apparent reason or explanation, uninterruptedly and for a long space of time ceases to worship at the society, manifests no intention of returning, and habituappear that the church or society in question ever became incorporated under these statutes. Under the 11th Amendment of the Constitution, adopted in 1833, the Roman Catholic denomination stands on the same footing before the law as other religious sects and denominations; and in the present case, there being no statutes having a special application, the rights of the parties depend on general principles of law as applied in Massachusetts, and on the usages which have prevailed here. Not much light is to be got from decisions as to the rights of pew holders in England or elsewhere, where different laws, usages, and systems of religious administration have been established. Atty. Gen. v. Proprietors of Federal Street Meeting-House in Boston, 8 Gray, 1, 64.

The first question is, What was the plaintiff's title? There was evidence as to this, and the report states that at the trial no question was made as to the plaintiff's title to the pews; but the defendant contended that they were owned only as pews are owned in the Roman Catholic church, according to the laws and usages of that denomination. We have therefore to look into the report to see what sort of a title the plaintiff had. The title to the soil stood in the archbishop. Prior to Stat. 1855, chap. 123, pews except in Boston were real estate. Trespass would lie for interference with the pew owner's right to his pew. Jackson v. Rounseville, 5 Met. 127. A conveyance of the pew, therefore, should be by deed. The conveyances under which the plaintiff claims title were executed in 1843 and 1852 by the archbishop, who owned the soil. These two conveyances were in the form of deeds, except that neither of them was under seal, nor called for a seal. This omission would render the conveyances ineffectual as deeds of real estate. But the plaintiff claims title by adverse possession. The conveyances ran to the grant-ally worships with, and apparently attaches himself to, another religious society, abandons his pew within the meaning of such a condition. Crocker v. Old South Soc. in Boston, 106 Mass. 499.

II. Rights of the parish or society.

The rights of the pew owner and of the trustees are distinct and separate, and are not in conflict with each other. Shaw v. Beveridge, 3 Hill, 26, 38 Am. Dec. 616.

The absolute ownership is in the corporation, or in the trustees, who can incur such title, alter the pews, raise and rebuild the church, without the consent of the pew holder, and without an invasion of his right. Trustees of Third Presby. Church in Newark v. Andrus, 21 N. J. L. 325.

It is not necessary to consult the pew holders, as such, when the corporation determines to make a sale or alteration, the right to property in pews giving no authority to object to such proceeding. Sohler v. Trinity Church, 109 Mass. 1.

A church corporation has power to regulate and order the renting of the pews, but not to make an absolute sale thereof except by order of the court. Re Reformed Dutch Church in Saugerties, 16 Barb. 237.

The only power that church trustees had under the New York Statute of March 27, 1801, relating to the incorporation of religious societies, was limited to a demise or lease of the real estate, or to the renting of the pews. Montgomery v. Johnson, 9 How. Pr. 232, where the pew was sold under an assessment sale made under a resolution by the church trustees to raise funds for repairing, the defendant claiming title under a prior sale, the court holding that neither had any title the trustees having no power to sell under the Act of March 27, 1801, relating to the incorporation of religious societies.

An absolute deed in fee, without reserving rent, of a pew in a church under the general act to incorporate religious societies was held void in Vielie v. Osgood, 8 Barb. 180.

Where a conveyance of land for church purposes provided that the seats "should be free," and that if they should be "rented or sold" the land should revert, the court held that the sale of the land for payment of the debts of the church was not a violation of the condition. Woodworth v. Payne, 74 N. Y. 196, 30 Am. Rep. 296.

The rights of the society are impliedly reserved in every grant of a pew. Fisher v. Glover, 4 N. H. 180.

subject to the right of the majority of the parish society or corporation to take down and destroy the house, wholly or only in part, if necessary for the purposes for which erected, and to repair, enlarge, or rebuild the same when decayed or useless. Wentworth v. First Parish in Canton, 3 Pick. 344; Re Rick Presby. Church, 3 Edw. Ch. 155, 6 L. ed. 607; Church v. Wells, 24 Pa. 249; Heeney v. Trustees of St. Peter's Church, 2 Edw. Ch. 608, 6 L. ed. 622; Abernethy v. Society of the Church of Puritans, 3 Daly, 1; White v. Trustees of First Soc. of M. E. Church, 3 Lans. 477; Cooper v. Trustees of First Presby. Church of Sandy Hill, 32 Barb. 222; Jones v. Towne, 58 N. H. 462, 43 Am. Rep. 602; Erwin v. Hurd, 18 Abb. N. C. 91; Daniel v. Wood, 1 Pick. 108, 11 Am. Dec. 151; Gay v. Baker, 17 Mass. 485, 9 Am. Dec. 159; Sohler v. Trinity Church, 109 Mass. 1; Fisher v. Glover, supra; Van Houten v. McKelway, 17 N. J. Eq. 126; Trustees of Third Presby. Church in Newark v. Andrus, 21 N. J. L. 325.

If the act is done by the corporation in the exercise of its legal rights it gives rise to no constitutional question. Cooper v. Trustees of First Presby. Church of Sandy Hill, supra.

The presumption is that the trustees, in performing such act, are carrying out the legal and reasonable will of the corporation. Ibid.

If, however, the authority is exercised in an arbitrary and despotic manner, the pew owner's rights will not be affected or concluded. Ibid.

No right of such holder is invaded or taken from him when the pew is destroyed from necessity or for the purposes of expediency or convenience. Ibid.

The right to change or take down pews rests, however, in necessity or propriety. Ibid.; and cases supra.

Where the dilapidated state of the edifice or the increasing congregation makes it proper for the trustees to rebuild, they may do so, and cannot be restrained by the pew holders. Heeney v. Trustees of St. Peter's Church, 2 Edw. Ch. 608, 6 L. ed. 622.

In Wentworth v. First Parish in Canton, 3 Pick. 344, the court held that the right of the parish to pull down the building for the purpose of rebuilding existed without complying with the terms of the Statute of 1817, chap. 139, which only extended its provisions to proprietors of churches other than parishes.

By the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts, chap. 20, §§ 37, 38, the parish has power when necessary for altering, repairing, or rebuilding a meeting-house to take down any pews therein, the pews

ees and their heirs forever; subject, however, to a condition. They also described the terms on which the grantees might lose their rights as owners. The conveyances were in form adapted to convey a good title to real estate in all respects, except in the want of seals or words calling for seals; and the grantees occupying under them, if they understood their title to be good, as they may have done, had a basis upon which to begin an adverse possession. Whether the plaintiff had gained a title by adverse possession was a question of fact. The court could not rule against him as matter of law as to his title, and we think did not intend to do so. Certainly, the plaintiff had a sufficient case for the jury as to his title, unless the title to pews in a Catholic church is different from the title to pews in other churches. There is nothing in the facts of the case to show that in 1843 or 1852 the title to pews in Catholic churches, when conveyed to individuals, was held by them in any different way, or that it conferred any different rights upon the pew owners, than in the churches of other religious denominations. The various pieces of testimony introduced to show the methods and usages of that denomination do not seem to touch the question of the rights of a pew holder who has a title to his pew.

The decrees of the council held in 1868 go to show that many of the ordinary corporate powers of proprietors of meeting houses are vested in certain ecclesiastical officers; but they do not reach the question what rights a pew holder acquires by virtue of his ownership of a pew. In respect to these rights, the plaintiff, as pew holder, stood in the same position as a pew holder in a church of any other denomination, under the general rules or principles of law. The general right of a pew holder, as between himself and the parish or the proprietors of the meeting house, is settled by a course of decisions.

being first appraised and the appraised value being payable to the owner, but no compensation is payable when the pews are taken down owing to the unfitness of the house for public worship.

By this statute, however, the provisions of the Act of 1817 were extended to parishes as well as societies. Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 20, § 37.

And equity will not interfere, by way of injunction, with the pulling down and rebuilding or removal of such church when expedient and proper. Van Houten v. McKelway, 17 N. J. Eq. 123; Re Brick Presby. Church, 3 Edw. Ch. 155, 6 L. ed. 607; Heeney v. Trustees of St. Peter's Church, 2 Edw. Ch. 608, 6 L. ed. 622.

Where a meeting house was erected solely for the use of a certain society, the court held that such society could not maintain an action quare clauum fregit against a pew holder for occupying the pulpit and preventing the society from performing service. Religious Cong. Soc. in Bakersfield v. Baker, 15 Vt. 119, 40 Am. Dec. 668.

III. Rights of the pew owner.

a. Compensation upon removal.

Upon the question of the right to compensation the decisions would appear to discord.

The point would seem, however, in the majority of cases to turn upon the question of the necessity for such alteration or removal, and a distinction would seem to be made between cases of the entire removal or demolition of the edifice and those of the removal or demolition of pews only.

The pew owner cannot be despoiled of his property. Kimball v. Second Cong. Parish in Rowley, 24 Pick. 847.

If necessity exists the right may be exercised without compensation to the pew holder. Cooper v. Trustees of First Presby. Church of Sandy Hill, 22 Barb. 222.

In some respects his rights are superior to those of the parish, and they must exercise their general ownership in subordination to them and be restricted to the general purposes for which churches are erected and parishes created. Revere v. Gannett, 1 Pick. 168; Kimball v. Second Cong. Parish in Rowley, supra.

The society has the right, where necessary, to remove or destroy a pew paying or tendering to the pew owner compensation for the loss. Jones v. Towne, 68 N. H. 462, 43 Am. Rep. 602.

There is no right to compensation where the removal is caused by the dilapidated condition of the building, or in case of its destruction by fire or other casualty, or in case of a necessary rebuilding through decay. Voorhees v. Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam, 17 Barb. 108; Wheaton v. Gates, 18 N. Y. 305; Church v. Wells, 24 Pa. 248; Kellogg v. Dickinson, 18 Vt. 266; Mayer v. The Temple Beth El, 52 N. Y. S. R. 638; Abernethy v. Society of the Church of Puritans, 3 Daly, 1.

The parish has a right to take it down, rebuild upon the same spot, or alter its form and shape so as to make it more convenient, and if this be done for useful purposes and the pews are destroyed the pew holders must be indemnified, the nature of a pew being such that it is subject to the regulations of the parish. Gay v. Baker, 17 Mass. 435, 9 Am. Dec. 159.

No tort is committed in the exercise of legal discretion. Kimball v. Second Cong. Parish in Rowley, 24 Pick. 847; Gay v. Baker, supra; Daniel v. Wood, 1 Pick. 102, 11 Am. Dec. 181.

It is only in cases where the meeting house has become so old, decayed, or ruinous as to be unfit for use, and when in fact the pew has ceased to be of any use or value as a pew, that the parish can deprive him of it without compensation. Kimball v. Second Cong. Parish in Rowley, supra; Howard v. First Parish in North Bridgewater, 7 Pick. 138.

Where the meeting house is so old and ruinous that the jury find it necessary to take it down, there can be no compensation to the pew holder. Howard v. First Parish in North Bridgewater, supra.

In cases of necessity there can be no complaint even if a different plan or arrangement of the pews is adopted. Voorhees v. Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam, 17 Barb. 108.

In Howe v. Stevens, 47 Vt. 262, however, it was held that where the edifice was ruinous so as not to be occupied for worship the court held the pew owner could only recover nominal damages.

It has been held, however, that not only must the house be decayed, old, and ruinous so as to be unfit for worship, but that it must also be in such a state as to render its entire demolition necessary in order to bar the pew owner's right to compensation. Gordon v. Hadsell, 9 Cush. 508; Wentworth v. First Parish in Canton, 8 Pick. 844; Howard v. First Parish in North Bridgewater, supra.

Where the edifice is pulled down by the resolution of the majority of the pew holders, the minority, in the absence of proof of malicious or wanton abuse of power, have no remedy. Wentworth v. First Parish in Canton, supra.

If the meeting house of a parish is abandoned although fit for public worship, and a new house is built in another location, the parish is not liable to

The parish or the proprietors may abandon the meeting house as a place of public worship without any liability to pew holders, although the pews may thereby be rendered nearly or quite useless; and the fact that the meeting house is still fit to be used does not render the parish or the proprietors liable. Fassett v. First Parish in Boylston, 19 Pick. 361. It is within the power of the parish or the proprietors to determine whether to take down a church or to make alterations and repairs. The pew holder cannot prevent them from doing this. The parish or the proprietors are the owners of the soil, and they may determine all matters relative to the structure to be maintained thereon. Daniel v. Wood, 1 Pick. 102, 11 Am. Dec. 151; Gay v. Baker, 17 Mass. 435, 9 Am. Dec. 159;

the pew holders in the old edifice provided the acts are not done wantonly or for the purpose of injury. Fassett v. First Parish in Boylston, 19 Pick. 361.

In Fisher v. Glover, 4 N. H. 180, the court held that a town had the right to remove, pursuant to a town vote, its meeting house from one location to another in order to accommodate the town to the best advantage, without being liable for disturbing the pew holder in his use of the same.

So where from overruling considerations it is expedient that a sale should take place, the interests of the pew owners are destroyed. Wheaton v. Gates, 18 N. Y. 305.

And the order of a county court for the sale of the building is valid and puts an end to the pew owner's rights. Ibid.

Where the building was sold by the corporation under the order of the court, and a new edifice built upon a new site, the court held that the pew owner was entitled to a pew in the new edifice corresponding in location to the one he occupied in the old church, upon payment of such sum as in equity he ought to pay if the new building cost more than the proceeds of the sale of the old one, or to compensation in damages in case of refusal. Mayor v. The Temple Beth El, 52 N. Y. S. R. 636.

In Van Houten v. McKelway, 17 N. J. Eq. 126, where it was sought to restrain the defendants from selling, the court held that the trustees or owners of a church have the right to take down, rebuild, or remove the edifice for the purpose of more convenient worship without making compensation to the pew holders for the temporary interruption.

But where the pew is destroyed for convenience or from expediency, and not from necessity, the owner has a right to compensation and indemnity. Voorhees v. Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam, 17 Barb. 108.

To the same effect, Re Brick Presby. Church, 8 Edw. Ch. 155, 6 L. ed. 607; Kellogg v. Dickinson, 18 Vt. 266; Mayer v. The Temple Beth El, supra.

Where the parish takes down a meeting house which is in good order, for the purpose of rebuilding one in better taste or of larger dimensions, compensation must be paid. Howard v. First Parish in North Bridgewater, 7 Pick. 138.

Neither the corporation, nor a majority of the congregation, can, for mere purposes of improvement or embellishment, deprive the pew owner of his property without compensation. Voorhees v. Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam, supra.

The corporation, however, has a right to change or take down pews according to propriety, upon giving compensation. Cooper v. Trustees of First Presby. Church of Sandy Hill, 32 Barb. 222.

If reconstruction is unnecessary, a mere matter of taste and fancy, and the pew owner is dissatisfied with the change, he may refuse to accept the new pew and ask for the price of the old pew or damages suffered by the unnecessary destruction of his pew. Curry v. Trustees of First Presby. Cong. of Erie, 2 Pittsb. 40.

If the owner accepts a new pew in place of the old one or in lieu of damages for its removal, he becomes the purchaser of a new and different pew. Ibid.

The parish has the right to remove or change the form of the pews for the purpose of repair and rendering the interior more convenient, or to destroy them altogether for the purpose of erecting or substituting a more commodious or elegant edifice without compensation in cases of necessity (Kimball v. Second Cong. Parish in Rowley, 24 Pick. 347; Gay v. Baker, 17 Mass. 435, 9 Am. Dec. 159; Daniel v. Wood, 1 Pick. 102, 11 Am. Dec. 151), as the good of the society may require.

A temporary unfitness may be caused by accident, or by partial decay, or by the making of necessary alterations and repairs, and will not bar the pew owner's right. Gorton v. Hadsell, 9 Cush. 508.

The mere fact that the house is unfit for worship upon a particular day is not sufficient to warrant the grant of compensation. Ibid.

Where the repairs and alterations did not interfere with the plaintiff's right to occupy his pew, but consisted in the placing and construction of other pews in front of his, the court refused him relief. Bronson v. St. Peter's Church, 7 N. Y. Legal Obs. 361.

The trustees of such a corporation have power to direct the alteration; the pew holders being left to claim reasonable compensation for the deprivation of their rights. Cooper v. Trustees of First Presby. Church of Sandy Hill, 32 Barb. 222.

Under General Statutes, chap. 80, §§ 35, 36, the rights of pew holders to compensation is secured. Schler v. Trinity Church, 100 Mass. 1.

By Stat. 1817, chap. 189, § 5, the proprietors have the right to take down any pews for the purposes of repairing, enlarging, or rebuilding, the pews being first appraised, the new pews to be sold, and the money arising from such sale to be applied in payment of the pews removed.

If the parish act in a legal manner in removing or destroying a pew they may lawfully tender the owner thereof the appraised value thereof, and thus bar any action for damages. Kimball v. Second Cong. Parish in Rowley, 24 Pick. 347, decided under the Act of 1817, chap. 189.

If they take from the owner the use of the pew, they must substitute its equivalent in money. Kimball v. Second Cong. Parish in Rowley, supra, in which case they were looked upon as purchasers, under Stat. 1817, chap. 189, at a fair compensation.

In Kimball v. Second Cong. Parish in Rowley, supra, the court applied the provisions of Stat. 1817, chap. 189, respecting the appraisal of pews upon removal to territorial parishes, holding that they might proceed according to that act.

b. Action for disturbance.

The pew owner cannot be divested of his rights except by consent. Religious Cong. Soc. in Bakersfield v. Baker, 15 Vt. 119, 40 Am. Dec. 668.

The right is absolute against every other person, and may be enforced in trespass, ejectment, or action upon the case according to the circumstances. Wentworth v. First Parish in Canton, 8 Pick. 344.

For the disturbance of the pew owner's rights the action is by way of trespass on the case. Perrin v. Granger, 33 Vt. 101, where the action was for disturbing the plaintiff, an administrator, in the use and occupation of the pew.

Re New South Meeting-House in Boston, 18 Allen, 497, 507.

Nevertheless, the right of the pew holder is held to be of such a nature that he is entitled to an indemnity if the parish or the proprietors exercise their right to take down the church when it is in such a condition that its demolition is not actually necessary. If it has become necessary to take down a meeting house,—that is to say, if a meeting house has become so old and ruinous that its further use is not practicable,—the parish or proprietors need not make payment to a pew holder for the removal of his pew. But if a meeting house is taken down, or the pews are removed, merely as a matter of expediency, the pew holders are entitled to payment. This rule has been so often stated and

To the same effect, Trustees of Third Presby. Church in Newark v. Andrus, 21 N. J. L. 325; Howe v. Stevens, 47 Vt. 262; Kellogg v. Dickinson, 18 Vt. 286; Shaw v. Beveridge, 8 Hill, 26, 38 Am. Dec. 616; Woodworth v. Payne, 74 N. Y. 740, 30 Am. Rep. 298.

The pew owner has an action in trespass or by way of writ of entry, against any one disturbing him in his seat. Gay v. Baker, 17 Mass. 435, 9 Am. Dec. 159.

An action quare clausum fregit will lie for breaking and entering the plaintiff's pew so long as pews are considered as real estate. Jackson v. Rounseville, 5 Met. 127.

For the violation of his right to possession he may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. O'Hear v. De Goesbriand, 38 Vt. 593, 30 Am. Dec. 638.

The party aggrieved has his action upon the case for damages, or he may hold a property in the new pews equal to the old one. Daniel v. Wood, 18 Mass. 102, 11 Am. Dec. 151.

So trespass lies by one tenant or pew owner against another owner as it lies against a stranger. O'Hear v. De Goesbriand, supra.

The owner has the right to remove any person wrongfully in the occupation of the pew, upon refusal to vacate using no more force than absolutely necessary. Jones v. Towne, 58 N. H. 455, 42 Am. Rep. 602.

Even against the owner of the legal estate in whom the land is vested. O'Hear v. De Goesbriand, supra.

Even though possession equal to an ouster of the society may have taken place, yet a pew holder has his action for the interference with his rights individually. Howe v. Stevens, 47 Vt. 262.

The members of a religious society who are the owners of pews in a meeting house cannot maintain a bill in equity against the members of the society owning the house, under Gen. Laws, chap. 154, § 17, for a sale of the house and a division of its proceeds. Trinitarian Cong. Soc. in Frankestown v. Union Cong. Soc. in Frankestown, 61 N. H. 884.

But the owner of a loose bench or seat in a church, occupied by the owner by the mere will and license of the trustees, cannot maintain trespass against them for the removal thereof, as it is not attached to the freehold. Niebuhr v. Piersdoff, 24 Wis. 316.

No action lies at the suit of a pew holder for a mere breaking and entry of the church building. Howe v. Stevens, supra.

In Solomon v. Congregation B'nai Jeshurun, 49 How. Pr. 264, the court refused an injunction restraining the society from removing and changing the pews of the synagogue in violation of the plaintiff's rights as a pew holder, and as contrary to the Jewish customs, usages, and doctrine, the meeting of the society being regular and ratified by the trustees: the equities being denied and the statute giving the trustees full power to regulate the renting of pews.

IV. Free church.

In the absence of any proof that, by usage or otherwise, rights were acquired to special seats, the trustees of a free church have a right to control 22 L. R. A.

places where persons shall sit. Sheldon v. Vall, 33 Hun, 854.

Where, by force of an act incorporating religious societies and its supplements, the church trustees are its wardens and vestrymen, who along with the rector control the temporal affairs of the church together with the discretionary authority in the disposition of the seats and pews of the church, the vestry by-laws govern the church in respect thereto. State v. Trinity Church in Trenton, 45 N. J. L. 230.

Therefore where the original holder joined in the adoption of the free church plan and occupied the pews till his death, when one was given up, the court held that the deceased had no alienable or transmissible interest in the pew, the right being one in land within the statute of frauds and subject to the rule that an interest in land must be created by deed under seal, and further that at most his interest was merely leasehold for the term for which pews were usually rented at the annual letting. State v. Trinity Church in Trenton, supra.

Where the church was free, without the renting of seats, and no proof was given of any conditions upon which parties were allowed to occupy any particular seat, or any seats at all, the court held that the plaintiff might be lawfully ejected from a pew although he was in the habit of using a particular pew, a request to vacate having been made. Sheldon v. Vall, supra.

V. Attachment.

A pew may be attached upon mesne process without the officer entering the building. Perrin v. Leverett, 13 Mass. 123.

In Massachusetts, whenever a pew is attached or taken in execution, notice thereof shall be given in writing, by the attaching officer to the clerk of the parish or religious society holding the church wherein the pew is situated, or left at his dwelling house or usual place of abode. Stat. 1822, chap. 93, § 7.

Where the only notice of attachment was an attested copy of the writ, without copy of the officer's return, and no notice of the pew attached, the party owning more than one, the court held there was not sufficient notice under the statute. Sargent v. Pelce, 2 Met. 80.

Where the execution is never recorded it is a fatal defect in the tenant's title, as everything requisite to a statutory title must appear of record. Ibid.

The levy of an execution gives a legal title over a party holding a mere assignment of the certificate of the right to the pew, which is a mere equitable interest. Barnard v. Whipple, 29 Vt. 401, 70 Am. Dec. 422.

The debt or expense incurred in rebuilding a church is not such an incumbrance upon the property as will render the covenantor or grantor liable to damages for a broken contract under his covenant against incumbrances. Spring v. Tongue, 9 Mass. 23, 6 Am. Dec. 21.

VI. Assessment and taxation.

A pew right by itself is not the subject of taxation. Church v. Wells, 24 Pa. 249 maintained that it must be taken to be the settled law of this commonwealth, however the law may be elsewhere. Howard v. First Parish in North Bridgewater, 7 Pick. 188; Kimball v. Second Cong. Parish in Rowley, 24 Pick. 347, 349; Gorton v. Hadsell, 9 Cush. 508; Wentworth v. First Parish in Canton, 8 Pick. 844. It is obvious that if, for any reason, the place of public worship has been changed so that religious services are no longer held in the church which was formerly used for that purpose, the value of a pew is much diminished; but, when such change has been made merely from reasons of expediency, the parish or proprietors cannot go on and demolish the pew without making compensation to the owner of it. He still has an existing right, which may not be very

The meeting called for the purpose of assessment for repairs must be one of the corporation duly called for that purpose. Mayberry v. Mead, 80 Me. 27.

The trustees and congregation can adopt a by-law or resolution to equalize the amount necessary for its support, and assess the proportionable amount upon each pew holder, even in the absence of an express provision in the constitution or articles of association authorizing them to do so. Curry v. Trustees of First Presby. Cong. of Erie, 2 Pittsb. 40.

The right to assess a tax upon the owner of a pew, used and occupied by him, and to charge him personally therewith, if it exists at all, is only by reason of the conditions and provisions of the deed under which the pews is held. First M. E. Soc. v. Brayton, 9 Allen, 248.

In Mussey v. Bulfinch Street Soc., 1 Cush. 148, where the society was duly incorporated, the court held it had a right to sell its pews, adopting a method of taxation with the consent of all the proprietors, as means of payment under its powers to purchase and sell or dispose of its property.

The taxation of a pew by a corporation may be assented to by the pew owner by receiving the deeds authorizing the levy and assessment of such pews. Ibid.

The unaccepted offer made by a pew holder to the corporation under Gen. Stat., chap. 30, § 41, to sell his pew, will not prevent the society's selling the same for taxes, especially where he has occupied the same continuously thereafter for a number of years the society exercising no act of ownership thereover or interfering with the possession. Curtis v. First Cong. Soc. in Quincy, 108 Mass. 147.

Where the sale was objected to upon the ground that the consent of all the pew owners was not obtained to the assessment under the Act of 1852, chap. 319, the parish whose house was erected prior to the Act of 1845, never having voted to avail themselves of the Act at a regular parish meeting called for that purpose as required by the Act of 1854, chap. 268, the proceedings being by a direct vote for that purpose, the court thought the parish had not placed themselves in a position to pass a vote to assess taxes on pews. First Parish in West Newbury v. Dow, 8 Allen, 369.

The original owner of a pew who bids for the same at an auction sale made by the treasurer for nonpayment of taxes, is not estopped from objecting to the sale as illegal though he continue in possession upon being sued for the price. Ibid.

In Mayberry v. Mead, 80 Me. 27, it was held that the assessors had no authority to add to the sum raised an outlay at their pleasure, and assess it on the pews in the absence of statutory authority, as their acts were in excess of their powers and therefore void.

The court will not restrain the sale of the pew by the trustees for nonpayment of assessments, upon the ground that the plaintiff was deprived of his share of the proceeds of the sale at the end or termination of the lease of the property. Abernethy v. Society of the Church of Puritans, 3 Daly, 1.

Where the terms of plaintiff's deed showed that the grantee should pay an annual sum equal to ten per cent of the original appraised value of the pew, and whatever further assessment should be made thereon, or forfeit the pew in case of default, the court refused to restrain a forfeiture and sale of the pew. Ibid.

Where a pro rata assessment upon the value of the pews was made by the trustees in order to defray the proper and necessary expenses, the pew owners will be liable therefor even though higher than the rate of assessment mentioned in the deeds. Curry v. Trustees of First Presby. Cong. of Erie, 2 Pittsb. 40.

Where the plaintiff, whose pew was owned by him before the incorporation of the church and subject to all rates and taxes imposed thereon for expenses, etc., sought to restrain the defendant from selling pews for nonpayment of taxes assessed thereon, the court held that it was no objection to such assessment that a clause in the subsequent charter requiring the majority's assent to taxation had been repealed even without notice to him. Bailey v. Trustees of Power Street M. E. Church, 6 R. I. 491.

Where an act of incorporation provided that the tax assessment upon pew holders should not exceed a certain amount for repairs, the support of the pastor and congregation, and payment of incidental expenses, and gave leave for any pew holder to surrender his pew upon giving written notice as required thereby, from which time assessments ceased as to him so far as supporting was concerned, with the right reserved for such owner to reoccupy and hold under the same terms upon giving the requisite notice, the court held that such surrendered pews could only be taxed to the yearly amount specified, and that the pastor's support could not be included. Second Universalist Soc. v. Cooke, 7 R. I. 69.

Pew owners are not liable in personam, for assessments, unless there is some special ground from which a contract to pay may be implied. St. Paul's Church in Syracuse v. Ford, 34 Barb. 14.

The trustees of a church have no power to make and levy personal assessments upon the pew owners to defray the salary of the minister as such owners are not liable in personam in the absence of special grounds raising an implied contract to pay. Trustees of First Presby. Cong. in Hebron v. Quackenbush, 10 Johns. 217.

Where the statute merely provided that the proprietors might at a duly authorized meeting tax themselves to raise money to repair when necessary, the court held that it only contemplated a tax personally upon the pew holders, and not the pews, no provision for forfeiture or sale for nonpayment being provided. Perrin v. Granter, 80 Vt. 593.

A joint liability cannot exist or result from the ownership of a pew in common, any more than a joint liability of all the pew owners results from a quasi tenancy in common of the whole church. St. Paul's Church in Syracuse v. Ford, supra, where defendants were sought to be charged as pew rent on an assessment.

A parish is not the proper party to institute an action to recover the amount due for a bid at an auction sale of a pew by its treasurer, for nonpayment of taxes assessed thereon for the support of public worship. First Parish in West Newbury v. Dow, 8 Allen, 369.

valuable, but which, nevertheless, is entitled to recognition under the laws. Religious services may be re-established there, or other uses of this pew may be open to the pew holder. The archbishop had no greater rights in respect to the demolition of the plaintiff's pews than an organized religious corporation of any other denomination would have had by reason of its ownership of the church. The right of the pew owner is not subject to the absolute power of such a corporation to destroy the pew; and it could not properly be ruled, as matter of law, that the plaintiff's rights were wholly gone. Under the terms of the report in the opinion of a majority of the court, the verdict must be set aside, and the case stand for trial.

Case to stand for trial.

In order to render a title under a tax sale deed secure, it must be shown by the record that a majority of the members of the corporation were present or voted to repair, raise the money or assess it on the pews. Mayberry v. Mead, 80 Me. 27.

The assessors of a tax upon pews for the repair of the church have no power to add to the sum assessed an overlay at their pleasure, and assess it on the pews in the absence of statutory authority. Ibid.

Relief under English law.

In order to entitle a party to a right of action for disturbance in the use of his pew, it must be annexed to a house or messuage in the parish. Mainwaring v. Giles, 5 Barn. & Ald. 354, and see cases supra, head, "English doctrine."

Sixty years' possession without proof of either a prescriptive right or a faculty is not sufficient to ground an action for disturbance. Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 423.

The grant of a part of the chancel by a lay proprietor is not sufficient in law to enable the grantee to maintain an action for pulling down the pews therein. Clifford v. Wicks, 1 Barn. & Ald. 498.

In order to prove a title by prescription in a pew it must be shown that the plaintiff has repaired it from time to time. Woollocombe v. Ouldridge, 8 Add. Ecol. Rep. 1.

Case is the proper remedy in case of a disturbance of the right of the owner. Bryan v. Whistler, 8 Barn. & C. 294.

Yet the action on the case did not lie if the pew was not annexed to a house, the disturbance being one of ecclesiastical cognizance only. Mainwaring v. Giles, 5 Barn. & Ald. 354.

But trespass will not lie, as the holder has not the exclusive possession. Stocks v. Booth, 1 T. R. 423.

Chancery has power in vacation to issue an ex parte prohibition restraining a spiritual court from trying a claim by prescription to pews in parish churches. Re Bateman, L. R. 9 Eq. 660.

A spiritual court will be restrained by prohibition from proceeding in a suit by a nonresident or extra parochial person for a pew in the body of the parish church. Byerley v. Windus, 7 Dowl. & R. 564, 5 Barn. & C. 1.

So such a court will be restrained by prohibition, from proceeding, where the pew is claimed otherwise than by prescription. Ibid.

Even when so claimed, if the defendant deny such prescription. Ibid.

Where the temporal right was in question, the court granted a prohibition against the disturbance of a seat in a church. Witcher v. Cheslam, 1 Wils. 17.

Where the consistory court adjudged the right to the pew to be in the plaintiff and admonished the defendant not to sit in it, and the court of arches reversed the sentence, but still admonished the defendant not to use it again, the court held these sentences not conclusive evidence of the plaintiff's right in an action between the same parties. Cross v. Salter, 3 T. R. 639.

The ecclesiastical court has jurisdiction over the grant of a faculty to appropriate certain parts of a parish church, which the queen's bench will not presume to have been improperly exercised nor restrain its judgment thereon even though the faculty may be larger than the court had power to grant. Hallack v. Cambridge University, 1 Gale & D. 100, 1 Q. B. 593.

In St. Mary Magdalen Bermondsey Church in Southwark, 2 Mod. 222, the court held that a vestry on notice given for the purpose by the churchwardens to the parish might, in case the church were ruinous and unrepairable, make a rate for pulling it down and rebuilding it upon its old foundation.

Such rate would be good though it include both the nave and chancel. Ibid.

And was enforceable by the spiritual court. Ibid. And prohibition will not be against a suit to recover it. Ibid.

Yet such a rate cannot be set by a spiritual court. Ibid.

It would seem that section 2 of the English Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Wm. IV., chap. 41, does not apply to the case of a pew in the nave of a parish church. Crisp v. Martin, L. R. 2 Prob. Div. 15.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

SEATTLE & MONTANA R. CO., Resp't.,

v.

STATE of Washington et al., Appts.

1. The taking of private property only is authorized by statutes providing for the exercise of the power of eminent domain, unless there is either express or clearly implied authority to extend them to public property.

2. Tide lands cannot be condemned for railroad uses, by reason of a statutory provision as to the appropriation of "state, school, or county land," under the Washington constitution and statutes, in the nomenclature of which "state" lands did not include tide lands.

3. The fact that a territorial legislature had no power over tide lands does not change the effect of a territorial statute as to railroads along "any river, stream of water, watercourse, etc.," after the admission of the territory as a state.

NOTE.—A peculiar case in respect to the right of one railroad company to overlay the tracks of another company in a narrow place for the purpose of crossing is presented above with an elaborate discussion of the general rights of railroads as to crossing each other.

4. The state, as owner of the fee of tide lands over which a street runs and of lands abutting on both sides of the street, is entitled to damages for the occupation of the street for ordinary railroad purposes.
5. The laying out of a street over tide lands is authorized only for the extension of existing streets, under Act March 24, 1880, giving a city the right "to project or extend" streets over such lands.
6. The length of a railroad, or the amount of its business, does not affect its right to retain its right of way as against a railroad which subsequently desires to appropriate a portion of it, although the amount of damages may be thereby affected.
7. Railroad tracks constructed lengthwise of a public street cannot be made to constitute a part of the company's yard so as to come within the provisions of a statute forbidding the crossing of a yard by the tracks of other companies.
8. The statutory right of one railroad to cross another does not apply to a commingling of tracks for 400 feet or more along a 30-foot right of way making it impracticable to operate either track, or set of tracks, when any one of the other tracks is in actual use.
9. The convenience of the railroad to be crossed and the probability of some other means of accomplishing the same purpose may be considered in determining the necessity of appropriating any part of the right of way by another company, where the statute requires the judge to be satisfied by competent proof of such necessity.
10. The points and manner of crossing, the place where, and whether under, over, or at grade are to be decided by the court, on an application by one railroad for the right to cross another, under Gen. Stat., § 1571.
11. A claim of the right to lay four tracks on another railroad's right of way may be denied by the court, where the place is practically a street and the whole room applicable to railroad purposes is extremely limited, and allowing two tracks will give better facilities than the other road enjoys.
12. An attempt to agree as to the points and manner of crossing must be made by a railroad which desires to cross another before it can seek the aid of the court, under Gen. Stat., § 1571.
13. It is not error for a judge who heard a case on the question of the necessity of the condemnation of land, under Code Prac., § 651, to send the jury trial to another judge.
14. It is proper for a railroad desiring to cross another to pay the expense of necessary frogs and crossing apparatus.

(August 9, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Superior Court for King County in favor of petitioner in a proceeding instituted to condemn a right of way for railroad purposes. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Ashton & Chapman and Andrew F. Burleigh, for appellants, the railroad companies:

The petition shows upon its face that it is beyond the power of the superior court, or a judge thereof, to order the appropriation of the 22 L. R. A.

property of the appellants to the use of the petitioner it being already devoted to a public use of as high and of a similar nature to that to which the petitioner seeks to appropriate it, to wit, railroad purposes.

The petition shows upon its face that the appropriation sought to be made is of the tracks and railroad yards and property of the appellants longitudinally for the purpose of enabling the petitioner to lay its tracks and yards along, over, and upon the same space, to be used for the same purposes, and none other, to which the appellants are devoting the property.

Neither the petition nor the proof shows a necessity for the taking as proposed.

Under the general authority to locate and construct a railroad from one point to another the company so authorized is not empowered to take the property of other railroads in use for railroad purposes.

Under a general authority a part of the right of way of a railroad cannot be taken longitudinally for the purposes of a highway, nor can the way be laid through depot grounds, shops, and the like which are devoted to special uses in connection with the road and necessary to its operation and in constant use in connection therewith.

New Jersey S. R. Co. v. Long Branch Comrs. 39 N. J. L. 28; Bridgeport v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 86 Conn. 255, 4 Am. Rep. 63; St. Paul Union Depot Co. v. St. Paul, 30 Minn. 359; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Faribault, and Prospect Park & O. I. R. Co. v. Williamson, supra; Atlanta v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 53 Ga. 120; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 266.

The right, however, of one railroad company to cross the tracks of another where such crossing is necessary is undoubted.

The power which the petitioner seeks to exercise is in derogation of private rights.

Therefore constitutional provisions or statutes authorizing its exercise must be strictly construed.

1 Rorer, Railroads, p. 298.

The constitutional provision making the question of public use a judicial question can in no manner change or modify this principle.

Lewis, Em. Dom. § 814; Norris v. Hill, 1 Mich. 202; Clark v. Teller, 50 Mich. 618; McCormick v. West Chicago Park Comrs. 118 Ill. 655.

The words "intersect" and "cross," in section 18, article 12, and the same words in section 1571 of the Statutes, have a well-defined legal meaning, which does not permit one railroad, in crossing or intersecting another, to include in the space occupied by such "crossing" an area fully occupied by the tracks of the railroads being crossed, and which in effect entirely destroys the yard of one of such railroads and renders the operation of the main lines and additional tracks of each impracticable, thereby destroying the greatest public benefit which is the very object of the legislative power.

Rorer, Railroads, p. 86.

The words "intersect" and "cross" are synonymous.

State v. New Haven & N. R. Co. 45 Conn. 344; Springfield Road, 78 Pa. 127; Pittsburg v. Chuley, 74 Pa. 259; United N. J. R. & Canal Co. v. National Docks & N. J. J. C. R. Co. supra; Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Detroit & B. O. R. Co. 64 Mich. 350; Prospect Park & O. I. R. Co. v. Williamson, supra.

There must be a very clear expression of the legislative intent to authorize the taking, by the power of eminent domain, of property which has already been devoted to the public use by an earlier exercise of the same power. If both uses cannot stand together with some tolerable interference which may be compensated by damages, or if the latter use, when exercised, must supersede the former, it is not to be implied that the legislature meant to subject property devoted to a public use, to such burdens.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 888, 889.

The necessity for such taking must be so absolute that without such appropriation the grant to the latter company will be defeated.

Sharon R. Co's App. supra; Eaergreen Cemetery Assn. v. New Haven, 43 Conn. 234, 21 Am. Rep. 648; Re St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. 37 Minn. 164.

Assuming Railroad avenue to have been lawfully created, the petitioner by virtue of the ordinance permitting the laying of its tracks on said avenue, could acquire no rights over tracks of appellant.

Re New York, L. & W. R. Co's Petition, 99 N. Y. 12, 23 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. p. 43.

The right of way and tracks of a railroad company cannot be taken for the use of another, unless the public good and interest demand it.

Northern Railroad v. Concord & O. Railroad, 27 N. H. 183; New York, H. & N. R. Co. v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. 36 Conn. 196.

The only exceptions to the rule that one road cannot take longitudinally the property of another are when there is some physical necessity, created by natural obstructions, federal or state prohibitions; or when the expense would be so enormous as to be inconsistent with the accomplishment of the undertaking, or so large as to make the future operations thereof unprofitable, any of which may create impossibilities or render the construction impracticable, as those terms are understood in this class of cases.

1 Rorer, Railroads, p. 284; Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Alabama Midland R. Co. 87 Ala. 501, 39 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 6; Sharon R. Co's App. supra.

The petition fails to state a case within either of the above exceptions.

Re New York Cent. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 407.

It is not shown either by the petition or proof that the petitioner and appellants cannot agree upon the points and manner of a crossing; simply that the appellants cannot agree to the peremptory demand of the petitioner for this particular taking of their property.

1 Hill's Code, § 1571.

This case presents an attempt upon the part of the petitioner to compel an agreement to its plan, but having no opportunity for voluntary action, or the exercise of discretion on the part of respondents. They must agree to this or nothing; accede to this demand or the court would decree it against their will.

In so far as the ordinance purporting to grant rights to the Seattle & Montana Railway Company conflicted with the rights previously granted to the appellants, it was inoperative and void and the petitioner acquired no rights thereby to enter into or take the whole or any portion of the property devoted by the appellants to their railroad purposes.

Co. v. Henry*, 81 Ill. App. 456.

Mr. James A. Haight, with Mr. W. C. Jones, Atty-Gen., for appellant the State:

The general law in regard to the exercise of the right of eminent domain by railway companies does not expressly apply to the state, and cannot therefore be held to govern the state.

The state is not bound by an act of the legislature unless specially named therein.

This was true at common law of the sovereign.

The statute conferring the right of eminent domain applies to lands, and not to waters.

The federal laws relating to the public lands and public domain do not apply to navigable waters.

Baer v. Moran Bros. Co. 2 Wash. 608.

This Act of February 1, 1888, was enacted by the territory of Washington, which at that time had no control over the tide waters of the state and whose assumed control, if embodied in any act of the legislature, must be deemed beyond its power and void, or the act itself must be deemed repealed by the constitution. Eisenbach v. Hatfield, 13 L. R. A. 632, 2 Wash. 236.

The tract proposed to be taken being navigable waters, is already devoted to the public use, and therefore cannot be appropriated to another public use, the statute not expressly authorizing such appropriation.

Waters where the tide ebbs and flows, and navigable streams, whether tidal or not, stand upon the same footing as public highways and other property devoted to public use. They cannot be interfered with under a mere general authority to take property for public use.

The dedication of the tract in question for street purposes, if there were a dedication, was not a dedication for railroad purposes. A railroad is foreign to the legitimate uses of a highway.

Lewis, Em. Dom. § 111.

Messrs. Burke, Shepard & Woods, for respondent:

Whatever rights the railroad respondents have in the premises, either by virtue of their right of way along a 80-foot strip granted by what is known as the "Ram's Horn Franchise," or by virtue of an alleged pre-emption right in the Columbia & Puget Sound Railroad Company, based on its ownership of abutting upland and of improvements on these premises in existence at the date of the Tide-land Act of 1890, these rights are certainly subordinate to the right which the city has exercised, in pursuance of the power of selection conferred upon cities by section 3 of article 15 of the State Constitution, to extend Washington, Main, and Jackson streets from the upland over these intervening tide lands to the harbor line; and railroad tracks can hardly be said to constitute a "yard" when their usefulness for yard purposes is cut short by their being traversed at intervals of 240 feet, by streets sixty-six feet wide, within the limits of which it is absolutely unlawful to switch cars or leave them standing.

The appropriation decreed does not give the petitioner rights superior to those left to the respondents on the premises, but only such rights as are implied from every right to make a railway crossing, and these with the proper limitation in favor of the existing lines.

Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Joliet, L. & A. R. Co. supra.

The right which the petitioner claims to condemn as against the state rests on the following clause found in that section of the Acts of 1890, authorizing the appropriation of property by private corporations for corporate purposes.

In case the land, real estate, premises, or other property sought to be appropriated is state, school, or county land, the notice shall 23 L. R. A.

be served on the auditor of the county in which the land, real estate, premises, or other property sought to be appropriated is situated.

Stat. 1890, § 2, p. 294.

The law can have no application whatever unless condemnation proceedings can be instituted against the state in respect to state land. The needs of the state, its topographical features, the absolute impracticability if not impossibility of building railway lines in many places without their traversing areas lying below the line of high tide, the duty resting upon the state to encourage, instead of resisting, enterprises that will develop its commerce and utilize its resources, all argue in favor of a construction of this act that will enable public carriers to acquire title as against the state, even to its submerged lands when necessary.

The contention that the construction of railroad tracks along "a street is foreign to its proper use as such has much authority opposed to it; and is especially untenable in this case, Railroad avenue having evidently been created for the express purpose of affording a pathway for steam transportation.

Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Joliet, L. & A. R. Co. 105 Ill. 888, 44 Am. Rep. 799.

Stiles, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding for the condemnation of a right of way for respondent's railroad, and involves three different appellants,—the state, the Columbia & Puget Sound Railroad Company, and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. The right of way sought to be appropriated lies over land between the high and low water marks in Elliott bay, on the water front of the city of Seattle.

1. The state appeared by the attorney-general, and moved to dismiss the proceeding as against it, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain it, which motion was denied. We think the court erred in its ruling on this point, for the following reasons: The state is the owner of this land, and there is no authority, either express or implied, in the statutes, for the taking of any part of it through exercise of the power of eminent domain. Our eminent domain act, as applied to railroads (Gen. Stat. §§ 1569, 1570; Code Proc. title 18, chap. 5), must be construed, as are all such acts, as having regard only to the taking of private property, unless there is either express or clearly implied authority to extend them further. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 273; State v. Anthoine, 40 Me. 435; Marblehead v. Essex County Comrs. 5 Gray, 451; Charlestown v. Middlesex County Commrs. 8 Met. 202; Stevens v. Erie R. Co. 21 N. J. Eq. 259. The respondent, we believe, concedes thus much, but it claims to avoid the force of it by citing that portion of Code Proc., § 649, providing for service of notice in condemnation cases, which reads as follows: "In case the land, real estate, premises, or other property sought to be appropriated is state, school, or county land, the notice shall be served on the auditor of the county in which the land, etc., is situated." Tide lands are "state" lands in a certain sense; that is, they belong to the state; but in all the nomenclature of our constitution and statutes the latter term does not include the former. Articles 15 and 17 of the Constitution treat of tide lands, while article 16 is devoted to school and granted or state lands. Title 3, chap. 7, Gen. Stat., provided for a "state land commission," to whose supervision "all public lands now owned by or the title to which may hereafter vest in the state" was committed. But this sweeping term "public lands" did not include school lands, tide lands, the harbor areas, the capitol grounds, nor any of the lands upon which the public institutions of the state are located, all of which are committed to the supervision of other boards or officers. As well might it be contended that because a railroad is authorized to enter upon and condemn "any" land for its tracks, depots, shops, roundhouses, etc., it could, by serving a notice upon the auditor of Thurston county, take the entire ten acres upon which the state capitol stands for a depot and shops.

This much for construction of the term "state lands." But it would seem that the legislature, in expressly conferring upon railroad companies the right to construct their lines "across, along, or upon any river, stream of water, watercourse, etc., which the route of such railway shall intersect or touch" (Gen. Stat. § 1572), has gone as far as it intended in this direction. True, this law was passed in 1888, when the territorial legislature had not full, nor perhaps any, jurisdiction over such lands as that in question; but no change has been made in the law, and we can only interpret it as we find it. What it meant then it means now; the change in the conditions from territorial times to the present has not changed the meaning or intent of the statute. The argument from convenience is strongly urged upon us, and it is said that, unless tide lands are thus subject to condemnation, much embarrassment will ensue to the building of railroads, because the situation of the land in many places, and particularly at this place, is such that no land is available for tracks and railway terminal facilities except along the shores of tide waters and upon the tide flats. The state of Washington, by its constitution, has taken an advanced and decided position with regard to navigable waters and the lands beneath them; a position which is scarcely anywhere paralleled by the written law. It proposes to determine for itself what shall be the disposition of these lands, and how the facilities for transportation upon, to, and from its great natural water highways shall be managed and enjoyed.

It will doubtless encourage and invite the building of railways, so as to take advantage of these lands and waters; but it proposes to say how that shall be done, and when and by whom. All railways built upon its tide lands, and all which may be built there until it shall have provided for them by law, will be there at sufferance, subject to be removed or rearranged, as the legislature subject to the constitution may ordain. It has harbor lines to lay in front of the city of Seattle which must be inviolate and the lands between which must be inalienable, except as the constitution permits; and it has its own policy as announced in legislation already enacted, concerning the disposal of the other tide lands.

2. The disposition of the case is, at this point, complicated with another matter, viz., the fact that the place over which this condemnation was sought was within what is known as "Railroad Avenue," a street laid out by the city council of Seattle in 1889, before the adoption of the constitution, and perpetuated in the freeholders' charter of 1890. The court below held that, inasmuch as this was a street authorized to be laid out by the constitution and the statutes of the state, the state, although a proper and necessary party to this proceeding, was not entitled to any consideration in the assessment of damages for the laying of the railroad along the street. We are unable to see why the state, as owner of the fee, and of lands abutting on both sides of the street, should not be entitled to damages for the occupation of the street for ordinary railroad purposes, even conceding this to be a lawful street, unless we were to adopt the theory that such occupation is not an additional burden for which the abutting owner may claim damages,—a theory which could hardly stand under our constitutional provisions against the taking or damaging of property without compensation, as the state would certainly be entitled to rank as a private owner in such a case. Hatch v. Tacoma, O. & G. H. R. Co. 6 Wash. 1. Neither the constitution nor the statute assumes to confer the fee of any tide lands for streets; an easement only is given.

The court's ruling last referred to, however, would not cut an important figure in this case, in view of a dismissal as to the state. But the main question is left,—whether Railroad avenue has any legal existence,—and this question vitally concerns the other parties to the proceeding. This street was declared to be a public street of the city immediately after the fire of 1889, when all of the ground covered by it was free from buildings or other structures, and it has been kept free ever since, although it occupies some of the space where such structures formerly stood. It begins at a point on the northeasterly shore of Elliott bay, and skirts the bay for several miles, much in the form of the letter U. It does not touch the upland at any point except where it begins, but keeps mostly within the low-tide line, until it passes south of King street, where the land recedes to the south and east, forming a large inner bay, which the street crosses. It is 120 feet wide, and is not the extension of any city street. While it was laid out as and declared to be a public street, its real purpose was undoubtedly to afford an open space for the use of railroads, and its entire width, except space for sidewalks, has been covered by specific grants to railroad companies, of a certain number of feet each. When fully occupied, in accordance with the terms of these charters, the public will have no practical enjoyment of any part of it except at street crossings. Ordinarily, a city has no power to take land merely for the purpose of furnishing a railroad company with a right of way. Railroad companies are endowed with the same power of eminent domain which cities have, to enable them to take care of themselves. Neither corporation can make use of its power to condemn land for the use of the other. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Galt, 133 Ill. 657, 672; Jagare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46. But the application of this rule to the present case may not be admitted, inasmuch as this street was not procured by condemnation.

Waiving the fact that the ordinance establishing Railroad avenue at the place in controversy was passed in July, 1889, when the city of Seattle had no jurisdiction to extend streets over tide lands, we shall treat the declarations of the charter of 1890 as in all respects a formally sufficient exercise of the authority conferred upon cities to extend streets over tide lands, even if the ordinance obtained no force at the adoption of the constitution. The article of the constitution on harbors and tide waters (15), after providing for the reservation of an outer harbor area not less than 15 nor more than 600 feet wide along the water front of all incorporated cities "for landings, wharves, streets, and other conveniences of navigation and commerce," and further providing for the leasing of rights to build structures in aid of commerce upon the harbor areas, contains this language: "Sec. 3. Municipal corporations shall have the right to extend their streets over intervening tide lands to and across the area reserved as herein provided." This provision is claimed to be self-executing, though it would seem that such a construction might be very embarrassing when the matter of the disposal of the inner tide lands comes up (that matter being committed entirely to the control of the legislature), since the state's officers can have no official knowledge of any city ordinance laying out streets unless provision is made for the authentication of such ordinances and their deposit among the records of the state. But, passing this point, the legislature, in the Act of March 24, 1890, providing for the government of cities of 20,000 inhabitants, confirmed the right granted in the constitution, in its enumeration of the powers of such cities, in these words: "Thirty-seventh. To project or extend its streets over and across any tide lands within its corporate limits, and along or across the harbor areas of such city, in such manner as will best promote the interests of commerce." In Columbia & P. S. R. Co. v. Seattle, 6 Wash. 382, we construed this statute as it reads, to enlarge the authority expressed in the constitution, so as to authorize a city to extend its streets across any tide lands, although the streets extended might never touch the harbor area. But now the position is taken that this statute covers the laying out of a street, at the will of a city of the first class, in any direction, and to any extent, whether there was a street to begin with or not. If that is the construction, it must be found within the language of the statute, or by a plain implication therefrom. The constitutional provision will clearly not admit of any such construction, for the words there used clearly imply that the only purpose sought to be subverted was to enable the public to freely reach the harbor area, where, of necessity, commerce between the land and the water must meet. The statute broadens the right to extend streets, and will be enforced as enacted. But, in searching for the authority claimed by the respondent, we note: (1) That the power is to extend or project streets, and by those two words we understand the legislature to have meant the same thing. They are common words, and, when applied to an existing thing, like a street, they mean to construct it in the same direction and with the same width. (2) They are used with reference to existing things, since what a city may extend is its streets. (3) The power is exhausted with the extension of existing streets.

Counsel pleads for a common-sense construction of the statute, and suggests the absurdity of a case where the harbor area is a half mile or more from the shore, and only streets to it can be laid out because the city is so situated that there can be no streets to extend crosswise. We admit the absurdity that would occur if such a state of things were left to continue for any great length of time. But we submit that we have exhausted the sense of this statute, common and all, when we have read it according to its plain and unmistakable language; and we can only repeat what has been said before,—that this matter is all in the hands of the legislature, which will, no doubt, remedy any absurdities which may result from the administration of this law as it was enacted. We may, perhaps, be permitted to doubt, however, whether the legislature will ever, advisedly, authorize the opening of such a street as this one seems to be, in a portion of its length, and the surrender of it bodily to three or four railroad companies in specific grants, to the practical exclusion of all other possible railroads from the city, except as they may pay tribute to those already in possession. This street was laid out 120 feet wide, which is an unusual width, and perhaps a greater width than that of most of the city's streets; but if 120 feet, why not 200, or as great a width as the city may determine? And if any action of this kind which the city may take for the benefit of railroad companies is to be held binding upon the state, why not go further, and claim that, where the route of this street passes to the southward over tide flats a mile or more, it might be widened indefinitely, so that broad ground would be furnished for side tracks. It is said in this record that the respondent has acquired 140 acres of these tide flats for its terminal purposes by paying for them, but the principle which it invokes as against the state would have applied almost as well had the city extended another street over that whole area, and then given it a franchise to lay tracks across it. It is not the business of municipal corporations either to build railroads or to specially facilitate railroad companies. They have the power to regulate them, and nothing more. Gen. Stat., § 520, subdiv. 9. Having disposed of the state's part of this case, we now turn to the other appellants.

3. The respondent is constructing a new railroad, which, together with other allied roads, will constitute the main line of the Great Northern Railway system, extending from St. Paul, Minn., and West Superior, Wis., to the city of Seattle. It will need, and has already arranged for, large terminal and repairing and building facilities at Seattle, a part of which are to the north of the city, and the remainder are to be at a distance of some five miles from the others, at the south. Ground for a passenger station has been obtained in the neighborhood of Jackson and Third streets, and the place intended for the freight yards is the 140 acres above spoken of. Its franchise over Railroad avenue consists of a permission to use 60 feet in width of that street throughout its length for one or more tracks. This width will accommodate four tracks, and it is prepared to place them all at once. But when it reaches a point opposite the principal business portion of the city it comes upon ground which has for many years been wharfed over by the appellants, and used by them for railroad purposes, partly under ordinances of the city, one of which was under discussion in this court recently in the case of Columbia & P. S. R. Co. v. Seattle, and partly without any public authority shown by the record. A little to the northward of Washington street the four tracks of the respondent, curving to the westward, meet two of the appellants' tracks, curving slightly to the east. But for the fact that Railroad avenue, in the middle of which the respondent's tracks are, curves to the west of this point, there might be no necessity for any crossing or interference of the two sets of tracks, for by running its line some 60 feet to the west over private property and street crossings, respondent could lay its tracks substantially parallel to the others. Proceeding further southward, the position of the appellants' two tracks is such, curving as they do from nearly the center of Railroad avenue at Washington street, to nearly the extreme west side of the avenue at Main street, one block further south, and back across the avenue to its extreme east side at Jackson street, still another block south, that within a distance of some 700 feet the respondent's two easterly tracks will cross the appellants' said two tracks twice, and its two westerly tracks, for about 500 feet, will be upon and among said two tracks in such a manner, owing to appellants' curves, that no part of either track can be operated while any portion of another is in use. Add to this that 60 feet south of Washington street the Columbia & Puget Sound company, which uses the easterly of appellants' said two tracks, has a side track extending thence, parallel to its other track, to Jackson street and beyond; at Main street another side track commences within respondent's west track, and curves to the north and west to a wharf where the Columbia & Puget Sound Company has its passenger station; at Jackson street the Northern Pacific Company, beginning about the east line of Railroad avenue, runs out a spur, and crossing all of respondent's tracks going west to a wharf; and just north of Jackson street the Columbia & Puget Sound Company turns off two side tracks near the east side of Railroad avenue, which tracks run to Washington street. The four main tracks of respondent do not touch the last-mentioned side tracks, but at Main street it is proposed to run two tracks from its two easterly main tracks, by about an eight-degree curve, easterly across appellant Columbia & Puget Sound Company's two side tracks to its station grounds at Jackson and Third streets; and again at King Street, the Columbia & Puget Sound Company has two elevated coal bunkers for delivering coal to ships, with several tracks on each. One of these bunkers is high enough to permit of trains of cars passing under it, but the other is not, and, in order that room may be made, it is proposed to rearrange and rebuild this bunker. There is no practical possibility of respondent's passing these bunkers to the southward in any other way than that proposed, unless its entire road be carried to the east past its passenger station, and thence across appellants' tracks beyond where the bunker tracks commence. By keeping its tracks to the west, from Washington street south to about Jackson, respondent can avoid all of the complicated crossings, and by that method, if it pursues the plan of continuing its four tracks southward, they will cross only the spur of the Columbia & Puget Sound Company to its wharf, the spur of the Northern Pacific Company to its wharf, and the elevated tracks to the coal bunkers; all of which crossings will be nearly at right angles; and its passenger station tracks will need to cross but three of appellants' tracks once at Jackson street. The proof shows such an arrangement would be practically as easy a line for respondent to build and operate as the one proposed by it. It was the testimony of every witness upon the stand in the case that the plan proposed by respondent made a most undesirable series of crossings, which are to be avoided, from a railroad point of view, by all means, if reasonably possible; and from the standpoint of the public, which has occasion to use the cross streets constantly, and which will furnish the patronage of all these railroad companies, the desirability of some other scheme is equally as great, for the constant dangers arising from the operation of a railroad traffic amounting to from 200 to 400 train movements a day, according to the estimates of both parties, are too obvious for argument, occurring as they will in the heart of a busy city. As proposed, in the space of 700 feet there are 28 crossings at such a sharpness of angle that trains could not move upon some of the tracks which lie substantially parallel to each other without coltion; and such facilities as the Columbia & Puget Sound Company has for the transaction of its local business in the city, over the side tracks mentioned, to wagons, would be almost entirely destroyed. Time and effort were expended in showing that this arrangement of tracks could be operated by means of interlocking switches and watchmen. Of course, it could be done, and it does not take evidence to demonstrate it; but neither does it take evidence to show that it must be a most embarrassing situation to all the parties to the case, as well as to the public. Respondent suggested that, in so far as the appellants' principal tracks were concerned, they could save the most of these crossings by moving their tracks over to the east side of Railroad avenue, where the city has voted them 30 feet of the avenue for that purpose; but it is well understood that one railroad company is not thus required to turn out of its established way for another coming into the same neighborhood later. The last comer must accommodate itself to the first, unless another contention of respondent, to be noticed later, is sustained. Probably much, perhaps all, of this difficulty has arisen from the attempted establishment of Railroad avenue, and the assumption of the respondent that it could not travel outside of its limits. If so, an ordinance from the city is all that lies in the way of correcting the error.

Other matter in the case related to the comparative length of the respective railroads, and the traffic upon them past and prospective. Particular obloquy was sought to be cast upon the Columbia & Puget Sound road because it is but a short line, leading into some coal districts. But the statutes, and the administration of them by courts, do not make the right of eminent domain depend upon the length of a railroad or the amount of its business; and neither does the right of a railroad company to keep what it is in good faith employing in such business as it has depend upon the like considerations. Those matters relate entirely to the damages to be allowed when it is proposed to cross their rights of way and tracks,—a subject which this opinion will not discuss. The evidence clearly showed that neither of the appellants had such facilities in Seattle as they ought to have. These were somewhat awkwardly situated for the present and future operation of the roads, but they were put there when they had to serve a much smaller community, and the owners now have to operate them as best they may. All of this, however, does not detract from the right of these companies, as against the respondent, to have them remain as they are, undisturbed, except as its necessities, as an equal servant of the public, may require them to be trenched upon.

4. All this is certainly true, unless a point now to be noticed is sustained. Section 1571, Gen. Stat., reads as follows: "Every corporation formed under this chapter for the construction of a railroad shall have the power to cross, intersect, join and unite its railway with any other railway before constructed at any point in its route, and upon the grounds of such other railway company, with the necessary turnouts, sidings, switches and other conveniences in furtherance of the object of its connections, and every corporation whose railway is, or shall be hereafter, intersected by any new railway, shall unite with the corporation owning such new railway in forming such intersections and connections, and grant the facilities aforesaid; and if the two corporations cannot agree upon the amount of compensation to be made therefor, or the points and manner of such crossings and connections, the same shall be ascertained and determined in the manner provided by law for the taking of lands and other property which shall be necessary for the construction of its road." Without any direct provision on the subject, one railroad must have the right to cross another, since the authority to build railroads from one part of the country to another could not be exercised without it; and the foregoing section merely regulates the manner of acquiring that right, with some others. Appellants contend, however, that the plan proposed by respondent is not entitled to be treated as a crossing, but as a longitudinal taking of their property devoted to public uses, and therefore not authorized either by the statute or by decisions of courts. It is a general rule that property which is already devoted to one public use, such as streets, parks, burying grounds, state, county, and other public institutions, and railroad rights of way, station grounds, terminal grounds, yards, and the like, cannot be taken for another public use under the eminent domain laws, unless there is express or clearly implied statutory authority therefor. Gen. Stat., §§ 1574, 1575, provide for cases where public grounds under the jurisdiction of counties and cities are necessary for railroad purposes, but there is nothing further in our statutes on that subject except that Code Proc., § 658, makes provision for the cases where it is necessary for a railroad to go through a canyon, pass, or defile already occupied by an earlier road. The leading cases on this point are Re Boston & A. R. Co., 53 N. Y. 575, concerning the taking of a public park, and Re Buffalo, 68 N. Y. 167, where lands used for railroad yards, tracks, and switches were sought to be taken for the building of a canal. Others are: Baltimore & O. & C. R. Co. v. North, 103 Ind. 486; Providence & W. R. Co.'s Petition, 17 R. I. 324; St. Paul Union Depot Co. v. St. Paul, 30 Minn. 359; Barre R. Co. v. Montpelier R. Co. 61 Vt. 1, 4 L. R. A. 785; Sharon R. Co.'s App. 122 Pa. 533.

Appellants, as an inducement to the holding that the respondent's plan amounts to a longitudinal taking, ask a finding that the tracks to be crossed constitute a part of their yard, but we do not think they make out a case for the application of the rule as to yards. Certainly the Northern Pacific Company does not, for it has only one track and one switch leading to its wharf within the disputed ground; and as to both appellants, if the ordinance No. 262, sustained in Columbia & P. S. R. Co. v. Seattle, supra, is to have any force in limiting its authority to lay tracks along the water front, they exhausted their right to lay tracks when they constructed a double track along the 80-foot right of way designated by the ordinance, for there was no mention of side-tracks in the ordinance except switches to wharves. As to the bunker tracks in King street, we think it safe to say that no railroad company should be permitted to claim that tracks, no matter how numerous, when constructed lengthwise upon a public street, constitute a part of its yard, so that they may not be crossed by a new railroad where there is a reasonable necessity therefor. In such case, all that the railroad has is a permanent license, not coupled with any interest in or ownership of the land, or any contingency through which it may acquire the land. But, notwithstanding we cannot find these to be yards of the appellants, it appears obvious from the maps on file in the case that as to the two westerly tracks of respondent there is much more than a crossing, or even a double crossing, for these two tracks lie lengthwise of the appellants' 80-foot right of way, or so nearly so that for a distance of more than 400 feet it will be impracticable to operate either track or set of tracks when any one of the other tracks is in actual use, for want of passing room. We do not think that the creation of such a situation is what the law means when it gives one railroad the right to cross another, nor did any of the witnesses, some of whom were persons of large experience as engineers and practical railroad operators, speak of any such case existing. One instance of a double crossing caused by the straight track of one road intersecting the curved track of another at Dayton, O., was shown to have existed for some years, ending fifteen years ago; but whether that case was brought about by condemnation proceedings or not did not appear. It was testified that there were some worse crossings than this proposed, all things considered; and the respondent, as an example, put in evidence a number of the Chicago Engineering News, containing a cut of a certain set of crossings in that city at Stewart avenue and Twenty-First street. The crossings illustrated look complicated enough certainly, but, although five different railroads cross each other's tracks at that point, none of them having less than two, and one of them having four tracks, there is not one double crossing, and there is no instance of a track or set of tracks overlapping and running parallel to and upon the tracks of another road. Moreover, the article to which the illustration belongs is devoted to a lamentation over the state of things in Chicago growing out of the numerous and complicated grade crossings of railroads, of which the Stewart avenue crossing is presented as a fair sample, and to a consideration of the best method of doing away with what has become such a nuisance that the city of Chicago, as the article shows, has ordered the elevation of all such tracks, at immense cost, or their removal from an area half a mile wide by two or three miles long. The argument to be drawn from this example is not favorable to this proposition, considered as a crossing. Concerning a proposed crossing very much less complicated than this, it was said in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Texas & 22 L. R. A.

St. L. R. Co., 10 Fed. Rep. 497: "The most common experience has little need of the testimony of experts to aid it in reaching the conclusion that such crossings as this application seeks to have restrained would be such a source of danger of collision in the transit of trains as could not be adequately compensated by any moneyed consideration, and such as should not be permitted except under the pressure of some paramount necessity for the service of the public convenience or of the state."

5. But passing this matter, the final position of the respondent is that, no matter what may be the character of the crossing, or how destructive of the property of the existing road, "it is for the corporation building the new line to select its route, as all the considerations bearing upon that selection dictate to it; and that, if such route requires a crossing and recrossing of an existing line, the new corporation has as much right, under the statute, to make such crossing and recrossing, as it would have to make a single crossing, though it admits that an attempted crossing in bad faith, merely for the purpose of vexing the senior road, should not be permitted. This is to say that, so long as the junior road is not convicted of bad faith in its proposition, the courts have no right to inquire into the necessity of the place and manner of crossing, but must simply proceed with an assessment of damages; and this requires a study of our statutes on the subject. Certainly all of the provisions of Gen. Stat., chap. 5, title 18, conferring these powers on railroad corporations, are to be exercised in the manner provided for in Code Proc., chap. 6, title 9, known as the "Eminent Domain Act." Section 1571 of the former volume, concerning crossings, expressly makes the latter law applicable where the companies cannot agree. Now, it is a provision of Code Proc. § 651, that if at the time and place appointed for the hearing of the petition the court or judge shall be satisfied by competent proof "that the land, real estate, premises, or other property so sought to be appropriated, are required and necessary for the purposes of such enterprise," he shall make an order for a jury. The mere statement of the petitioner is not, under this law, to be taken as final, but the court must be satisfied by "competent proof," and upon that, and that alone, he is authorized to act further. Nothing is said about cases where there may be a failure of such proof, but the plain implication follows that if the proof is not made the proceeding must fail; and this proof must satisfy the court that the condemnation as proposed is "required and necessary," a mere showing of convenience or lessening of expense not being sufficient. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 303; Re New York Cent. R. Co. 68 N. Y. 407; Sharon R. Co's App. 123 Pa. 533; Re St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. 37 Minn. 164. The same rule applies to a crossing, and according to the record the respondent must have been proceeding in the court below in exact accordance with it, for it voluntarily begun the case by offering proof to sustain the claim that the crossing proposed was necessary, and some hundreds of pages of testimony are devoted to nothing else. But respondent's claim goes further, and asserts that if there exists a necessity for it to proceed in the way it has laid out, the court is not to consider the convenience of the railroad to be crossed, or the practicability of some other means of accomplishing the same purpose. Plainly, however, if the junior road proposes to cross at a place or in a manner which will be disproportionately injurious to the senior road, and there be, near by, some other place where the junior road can pass and go on its way without any crossing at all, it must follow that there is no necessity for the crossing; or, if there be some other point or means of crossing imposing less cost and difficulty of operation to the senior road, and merely additional expense to the junior, the like want of necessity is evident. Respondent does not suggest what disposition is to be made of that portion of Gen. Stat., § 1571, which provides that, "if two corporations cannot agree upon . . . the points and manner of such crossings . . . the same shall be ascertained and determined in the manner provided by law for the taking of lands." But it is very important, and, it seems to us, is decisive of this whole matter; and it is especially pertinent here, because there must be some crossing of appellants' tracks to enable respondent to prosecute its enterprise. The matter of the points and manner of crossing—the place where, and whether under, over, or at grade—is to be decided upon the application to the court, and by the court, since it is an exercise of its equitable powers. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago & P. R. Co. 6 Biss. 219; Humeston & S. R. Co. v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 554.

■ Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co., 97 Ill. 506, is cited in support of the contrary view, to the effect that the junior road can determine the point of crossing for itself, so long as it is willing to pay for the damage it does, which was assessed in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 100 Ill. 21. In the former case the court was construing a statute in the exact words of our General Statute, § 1571, with this important difference: that whereas our statute provides that where there is no agreement between two corporations as to the points and manner of crossing, "the same shall be ascertained and determined in the manner provided by law for the taking of lands," etc., the Illinois statute merely provided that "the same shall be ascertained and determined in manner prescribed by law." Ill. Stat. 1885, p. 1914. Moreover, the eminent domain act there under discussion did not contain any provision requiring the court to be satisfied of the necessity of the proposed taking. Id. p. 1041 et seq. Counsel in the case were contending that, although the authority to cross was expressly conferred by the statute, it was inoperative, because it was a taking of property which could not be taken without compensation, and no law had been enacted for the ascertainment of such compensation, or the determination of the points and manner of crossing. This necessitated the court to say that, if the contention set up were sustained, it must result that in Illinois no railroad could cross another at any point, and it held that the eminent domain act was adapted and intended to ascertain damages for railroad crossings as well as other condemnations of land; but it confessed that the law had not provided the method of ascertaining the points and manner of crossing, and therefore fell back upon the language of the act, which gave to every railroad company the right to cross any other railroad "at any point on its route," and interpreted it to mean that the petitioner could fix its own point of crossing, referring at the same time to a former law which authorized commissioners to fix points and manner of crossing. The difference between the two statutes is so obvious that comment is unnecessary. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co., 116 Ind. 578, was a discussion of a statute exactly like our General Statute, § 1571, except that in case of disagreement the points and manner of crossing were to be fixed in the first place by commissioners, as was the amount of compensation. On a question as to the sufficiency of allegations showing an inability to agree, one side arguing that the necessity for showing disagreement only went to compensation, the court said: "We cannot see how it is possible, looking solely to the words of the statute, to hold that all that it refers to is the matter of compensation, since to reach such a conclusion many strong and clear words must be rejected. The language is plain, but, plain as it is we think it is not more plain than the object the legislature intended to accomplish. It is very evident that the legislature did not mean to invest the younger company with power to cross at any point and in any mode it might elect, but that, on the contrary, it meant to prevent the arbitrary exercise of the right to cross the older line. . . . Our conclusion is that, the negotiations which the statute requires the two corporations to conduct, are negotiations concerning the three things we have enumerated [compensation and points and manner of crossing]; and that if these three things cannot be settled by negotiation they must be brought before the appropriate tribunal for adjudication."

Cases upon statutes similar to ours and that of Indiana are found in St. Louis Transfer R. Co. v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 100 Mo. 419; Montana Cent. R. Co. v. Helena & R. M. R. Co. 6 Mont. 416; Toledo, S. & M. R. Co. v. East Saginaw & St. C. R. Co. 72 Mich. 206; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Leavenworth, N. & S. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 728; Re Lockport & B. R. Co. 77 N. Y. 557; Re Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 86 Minn. 481, and Re St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. 87 Minn. 164,—in all of which the matter of the points and manner of crossing are treated as, or held to be, matters of judicial determination, and not of arbitrary exercise by the petitioning corporation. In the case cited above from 6 Biss., the United States circuit court of the northern district of Illinois held that although the general policy of the legislation of that state was to allow a new railroad to cross an existing road at grade, equity would interfere to compel it to cross overhead, at a different place, although at some cost, where the crossing proposed would materially interfere with the business of the senior road. Judging this case by our own statute, and by these authorities, we do not think the respondent made out a case of necessity that it should cross appellants' tracks at the point and in the manner proposed, except as to the crossing beneath the coal bunkers of the Columbia & Puget Sound Company. One of the items in which it failed has not yet been mentioned, viz. its proposed crossing with four tracks. It showed no definite intentions as to the use of so many tracks, but suggested that it would probably use the easterly two tracks for the passage of its freight and passenger trains, the third track for the passing and repassing of locomotives, and the fourth track for connections with wharf spurs. All of these tracks it calls "main tracks," but they are obviously so in name only. The main line consists of but a single track, and the three additional tracks are for mere connections between the shops and the freight yard. Conceding, however, that a necessity was shown for two tracks for the purposes of such connection through the city, it was not suggested why these two tracks could not perform the entire service required or likely to be required. Ordinarily, under the statute, a railroad company is permitted to condemn land to a certain width, and may maintain thereon as many tracks as it sees fit, but in such a case as this, which the principal of respondent's witnesses likens to the case of a canyon or defile, the right of way allowed to be taken should be limited to what is necessary, and no more. With two tracks—an inward and an outward—it would have facilities far better than those of either of the appellants, and equal to those of nine railroads in ten in the country. Being located practically upon the streets of a city, where the whole room applicable to railroad purposes is shown to be extremely limited, it should not expect more, and certainly the public interest would not be subserved by conceding more for the purposes set forth.

6. Appellants claim that there was no attempt on the part of respondent to agree with them as to the points and manner of crossing, and the record sustains them. In cases of crossings like this one courts will not be technical in requiring an effort to agree, but the theory adopted by respondent, and its letter to the appellants, shows that it purposely limited its proposition to one of compensation for the specific crossing described, and none other. The importance of showing an attempt to agree upon the three cardinal points appears from the cases we have cited elsewhere.

7. We do not think there was error on the part of the judge who heard the case on the question of necessity in sending the jury trial to another judge, for the case consisted of two distinct branches. If a judge should die, or retire from the bench after ordering a jury, there could certainly be no necessity for going over the preliminary part of the case again; but on a motion for a new trial before the second judge we think the whole case would be open for re-examination, and the better practice would be for the same judge to hear the entire matter.

8. The proposition of the respondent to stipulate that it would put in and maintain at its own expense all necessary frogs and crossing apparatus was proper, and is sustained by authority. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Joliet, L. & A. R. Co. 105 Ill. 388, 44 Am. Rep. 799. So, also, we think, would be the proposition to construct and maintain the overhead arrangement for the crossing under the bunkers, the manner of construction being left to the court in case the parties could not agree.

Other questions in the case appealed have either been covered or are immaterial to a decision.

The decree of appropriation will be reversed, and the petition dismissed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania
v.
POTTSVILLE IRON & STEEL CO., Appt.

(157 Pa. 500.)

The immunity from taxation of the capital stock of a corporation "exclusively engaged in manufacturing," under the Act of 1889, is not lost by its possession of the ancillary power of mining to supply its own raw material, especially where it has never used, or sought to use, this power.

(October 2, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Dauphin County, settling the account of the auditor general and state treasurer of a tax on the capital stock of the defendant corporation for the years 1890 and 1891. Reversed.

The material portion of the opinion of the court below was as follows:

"(1) The Pottsville Iron & Steel Company, defendant, has a capital stock of $450,000. It paid no dividends during the tax years 1890 and 1891, and its proper officers made and returned to the auditor general for each of said years a valuation of the capital stock at par or $450,000. The auditor general thereupon settled and entered, and the state treasurer approved, an account for tax for said years, charging tax at three mills upon the appraised value of the stock for each of said years, the tax amounting to $1,350 for each year, or $2,700 for the two years. From the account so settled, entered and approved, the company duly appealed to this court.

P. Co. (Pa.) 14 L. R. A. 107, with note on the question, What constitutes manufacture?—and People v. Wemple (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 70

"(2) Defendant was chartered under clause 17 of section 2 of the General Corporation Act of 1874, which provides for the incorporation of companies for 'the manufacture of iron or steel, or both, or of any other metal, or of any article of commerce from metal or wood, or both.' Section 88 of said Act provides that—'companies incorporated under the provisions of this Act for the manufacture of iron or steel, or both, or of any other metal, or of any article of commerce from wood or metal, or both, unless otherwise provided by this Act, shall, from the date of the letters-patent creating the same, have the powers and be governed, managed, and controlled as follows:

" 'Clause 1. Every such corporation may, in the manner prescribed in this Act, increase its capital stock to an amount not exceeding five million dollars, and shall have the right to purchase, lease, hold, mortgage, and sell real estate and mineral rights, to prove and open mines, to mine and prepare for market, or for their own use and consumption, coal, iron ore, and other minerals, and to erect and construct furnaces, forges, mills, foundries, manufactories and such other improvements and erections as they may deem necessary, and to manufacture iron and steel, or any other metal, or either thereof, in all shapes and forms, and either of these metals, exclusively or in combination with other metals or wood, and to transport all of said articles or any of them to market, and to dispose of the same, and to do all such other acts and things as a successful and convenient prosecution of said business may require; Provided, They shall not at any one time have more than ten thousand acres of land within this commonwealth, including leased lands.'

"(3) In its application to the governor for charter the company set forth that its object in seeking incorporation was for the purpose of 'having the right to dig iron ore, build and operate furnaces, forges, manufactories, rolling mills, and to manufacture machinery and other manufactures of iron and steel, and to have and exercise all of the rights and privileges conferred by the Act of April 29, 1874.'

"The company has no powers, privileges, or franchises except such as are conferred by the General Corporation Act of 1874 upon all corporations chartered since the date of its passage for the manufacture of iron or steel.

"(4) The capital stock of the defendant company is now, and was in 1890 and 1891, invested exclusively in blast furnaces, rolling and steel mills fully equipped, and in sundry building, appertaining thereto, in which said blast furnaces, rolling and steel mills it was and is engaged in the manufacture of pig iron, railroad iron, steel beams, channels, bars, plates, etc., for structural purposes in the county of Schuylkill, employing constantly from 800 to 1,200 men in said manufacturing business.

"(5) The defendant has never at any time exercised the right of eminent domain, nor engaged in the business of brewing or distilling spirits or malt liquors.

"(6) The defendant company is not and never has been engaged in any business other than that of manufacturing, as aforesaid. No part of its capital is invested in iron or coal land, it does not dig or mine iron ore or coal either to sell to others or for use in its own furnaces, but all of its capital is invested in its strictly manufacturing plant, property and business, and its corporate energies are confined exclusively to such manufacturing business.

"Upon the above facts defendant claims to be within the proviso to section 21 of the Revenue Act of 1889, which relieves from taxation upon their capital stock corporations 'organized exclusively for manufacturing purposes and actually carrying on manufacturing within the state' and we should so hold were it not for the decision of the supreme court in Com. v. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 151 Pa. 265, which, as we understand it, requires us to deny any exemption whatever to any corporation in whose charter we find a power, used or unused, to engage in any business other than manufacturing. In Com. v. Lackawanna Iron & Coal Co., 129 Pa. 346, it was held that the ownership of iron ore and coal properties and the mining of iron ore and coal for the supply of raw materials, while frequently convenient and desirable, were nevertheless, not essential or legally incident to the business of manufacturing, and, as we find that the law under which defendant is incorporated and which constitutes its charter confers upon it authority to own coal and ore lands and mine coal and iron ore, we must hold that it is authorized to make investments and do things not absolutely essential to a manufacturing business, and that, therefore, within the ruling in the Westinghouse Case, it is not entitled to exemption, but is taxable upon its entire capital stock, although, as matter of fact, it is not engaged in any other business, and its whole capital is invested in manufacturing. But in so ruling we reiterate what was said by McPherson, J., in Com. v. National Oil Co., Limited, 157 Pa. 516, viz.:

" 'While, however, in this case and in others, we have cheerfully obeyed the decisions made last year (reported in 150 and 151 Pa.), and do not question in the least the soundness of the abstract reasoning upon which they rest, we have met with so many practical difficulties in the effort to follow them that we respectfully request the supreme court to reconsider those decisions, and in the light of these unforeseen obstacles to reverse the judgment we are about to enter and declare taxable only upon so much of the defendant's capital as is not invested in its manufacturing operations.

" 'The phrase used by the Act of 1889—"exclusively organized"—is confessedly ambiguous. Its meaning in the statute may differ from its meaning in the dictionaries, and evidently depends upon the point of time which is relied upon as fixing the character of the corporation for the purpose of this particular tax. If the time of granting the charter is taken, no other conclusion can rationally be reached than that which has been announced in the cases referred to; but if the time of imposing the tax is taken, then the actual business of the corporation is the natural test. This, we respectfully submit, may fairly be concluded to have been the legislative intention, because (the language being doubtful) this construction allows apportionment wherever justice and equity demand it, and thus avoids the inequality of burden which otherwise must result; while the construction now adopted forbids apportionment altogether in a large number of cases the inevitable result being much friction and unintended injustice.

"We may be permitted to give a few examples of inequality. Here are two iron manufacturing companies, alike in all respects except that the charter of one contains a power to mine ore or coal. This power is not used and never has been used; nevertheless, although their business is precisely similar, one is exempt and the other is taxed. Again, the General Corporation Act of 1874, under which the majority of charters now exist, gives mining powers in section 88 to certain manufacturing companies. What is to be done with this class of cases? Are these mining powers to be considered as written in the charters, although they are not formally expressed? If so—and section 25 of the Act of 1874 declares that "the franchises granted shall be construed according to the same rules of law and equity as if (the corporation) had been created by special charter"—there is not an iron manufacturing company in the state, incorporated under the Act of 1874, which is entitled to exemption. On the contrary, all are already liable for considerable arrears. But, if these powers are not to be considered as written in the charters, with what justice is the tax imposed on a corporation chartered by a special act, merely because the right to mine is specially given? The right exists as really in the one case as in the other, and ought to affect both corporations alike.

"Take also the case of two corporations doing a similar manufacturing business, both of which are usurping a power not given by their charters, but only one of which possesses an unused franchise which is not manufacturing. Surely, both ought to be treated alike; and yet, one is taxed only upon the capital invested in the unauthorized business, and the other is taxed upon its whole capital stock, although the operations of the two companies are identical. And this inequality becomes more conspicuous, if the case is slightly varied and two corporations are considered, one of which has an exclusively manufacturing charter, but is usurping another franchise, while the other has a similar manufacturing power and in addition possesses the franchise to do lawfully what the other is doing unlawfully. If any discrimination is to be made, it would seem that the violator of law should bear the heavier burden. But the fact is otherwise; the usurper pays tax only upon the capital unlawfully invested, while the other is taxable upon its whole capital stock.

"Additional examples might be given, but these may suffice, for a moment's thought will bring to mind the slate companies, the coke companies, the fire brick companies and others of that class, to say nothing of many others that possess special charters containing particular privileges. We will only add, that the examples we have given are neither fanciful nor imaginary, and that we would not have made this unusual application if we were not abundantly convinced by our experience (which necessarily embraces a large number of cases that are not brought to the attention of the supreme court) that it is hardly possible to apply the present rule without severe and extensive hardship. Unquestionably serious practical difficulties exist and very considerable numbers of corporate taxpayers are either injured or threatened, because of the rule we are now bound to apply. We venture to express the hope, that a reconsideration of the subject will find no serious obstacle to adopting the alternative construction of a doubtful phrase, and may thus permit us to return to the hitherto well-established and equitable rule of taking the actual business as the test of corporate character. This inevitably leads to apportionment in all proper cases, and, with restored freedom of apportionment, these difficulties will disappear. So diverse and multiform are the charters and the powers and the actual business of manufacturing corporations that, without a full power to apportion, they can neither be fairly exempted nor fairly taxed."

"In this case there would, indeed, be no need of apportionment, because there is no investment of capital outside of the purely manufacturing business of the company. We can hardly conceive that it was not in the minds of the legislators to exempt such a corporation as this. If it is to be taxed there is neither equity nor justice in exempting any other manufacturing corporation, and yet, for the reasons stated, and in obedience to the ruling in the Westinghouse Case, we must hold, as a conclusion of law, that defendant is not organized exclusively for manufacturing purposes, and, therefore, not entitled to any exemption whatever."

Messrs. M. E. Olmstead and D. C. Henning for appellant.

Messrs. W. U. Hensel, Atty.-Gen., and James A. Stranahan, Deputy Atty.-Gen., for the Commonwealth:

The powers conferred by its charter conclusively show that appellant is not "organized exclusively for manufacturing business."

The powers contained in the charter of the defendant company, brings it within the ruling of Com. v. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. 151 Pa. 265.

See also Com. v. Lackawanna Iron & Coal Co. 129 Pa. 846.

It cannot be contended in a case like the present that the taxation of its capital stock would be, upon the part of the commonwealth, any embarrassment to the employment of capital in the class of manufacturing business that this company might be engaged in this state digging ore. It could not drive the employment of labor outside of the state, because the employment of labor in that part of the business authorized by the charters of this company that is not strictly manufacturing purposes could not be driven into another state, because the ore production is not there. This, therefore, would come within the ruling in Com. v. Northern Electric L. & P. Co. 14 L. R. A. 107, 145 Pa. 105.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant company was incorporated under the provisions of the General Law of 1874 (Pub. Laws, 73). One section of that act gives to companies incorporated under it for the manufacture of iron and steel the right to hold mineral land and mine coal, iron, and other minerals for their own use and for sale in market. In the application to the governor for letters-patent this company stated its objects to be to secure the right to "dig iron ore, build and operate furnaces, forges, manufactories, rolling mills, and manufacture machinery and other manufactures of iron and steel and to have and exercise all the rights and privileges conferred by the Act of April 29, 1874." The right to mine was conferred by the Act of 1874, and was applied for by the defendant as ancillary to the business of manufacturing, and not as an additional or alternate line of business to be pursued by the company at its own election. The findings of the learned judge of the court below show that the ancillary power thus provided by general law and by the articles of incorporation has never been used. It was conferred by the legal organization, but when the breath of life had been breathed into the new company its first work was to settle the character of its business organization, and arrange its plant accordingly. In doing this it seems to have determined that its entire capital should be invested in and devoted to the business of manufacturing. It bought no mineral lands, and has at no time owned, leased, or operated any mine. Upon these facts the question raised is whether this company is entitled to the exemption of its capital stock from taxation as a manufacturing company. The court below, with un concealed reluctance, held that it was not, and placed its judgment on the recent case of Com. v. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co., 151 Pa. 265. An examination of that case convinces us that it does not rule this. Incorporation had been effected in that case, not under the general law providing for the incorporation of manufacturing companies, but under one of those odious special charters, so frequently described as "omnibus charters." It was organized under the Act of April 9, 1872, entitled "An Act to Incorporate the Charters Improvement Company, and to Define the Powers thereof." These powers were defined by a reference to the Act of May 12, 1871, entitled "An Act to Incorporate the Improvement and Co-operative Company," etc. There is no hint of manufacturing in the title of either of these acts or in the body of them. In the language of our Brother Heydrick, the grant of powers in these acts was "so vaguely defined that it would be unsafe to say what was not authorized, if anything could be authorized by such generalities, except the issue of its own obligations as currency, which was expressly excluded, and manufacturing, which the most liberal construction of the Act of 1871 would not comprehend." The Westinghouse Company did not show, therefore, that it was ever organized as a manufacturing company by the law creating it, or that it had by any distinct corporate act limited and defined the objects and purposes of its business organization. In this case the defendant company was organized under the law providing for the incorporation of manufacturing companies. The purpose of its creation was to engage in manufacturing. Its investments have been made and its business arranged and conducted for this single purpose from first to last. It is in name, in the nature of its corporate powers and characteristics, and in its actual business operations, a manufacturing company, and nothing else. The mere possession of an ancillary power which it has never used or sought to use, which it had express legislative permission to hold, and which was evidently intended for use only in aid of its manufacturing enterprises, does not change the character of the corporation, or deprive it of its privileges and immunities as a manufacturing corporation.

It is urged that the word "exclusively," which is found in the Act of 1889, but was not found in that of 1885, requires us to draw a sharper line of demarkation between companies whose capital stock is exempt from taxation and those whose stock is subject to it than has been heretofore drawn, and subjects the entire capital of all manufacturing companies to taxation, if, under a mistake about their rights, they have secured the grant of any ancillary privilege not absolutely indispensable to manufacturing. We are not prepared to assent to this proposition. It would seem that in the use of this word the legislature had the old system of omnibus legislation in mind, and intended to discriminate against that class of corporations organized under special charters granted before the present constitution was adopted. Charters were then granted, and some of them are still in existence, conferring upon a single company the powers of a mining, a manufacturing, and a transportation company. Such a charter was actually before the court in Com. v. Westinghouse Electric Mfg. Co., supra. The manufacturing which is done by such a company may be in aid of its mining or its transportation business. Such a company is not organized, either as to its corporate powers or its actual business, exclusively as a manufacturing company, and is entitled to no exemption upon its capital stock. Many railroad companies make engines and cars for their own use, but they do not become manufacturing companies thereby, or entitled to the exemption extended to such companies. A manufacturing company, on the other hand, does not cease to be such because it seeks to supply its raw material by production instead of purchase. It may subject so much of its capital as is so employed to taxation, but it does not lose its own identity. The question whether a given company is incorporated as a manufacturing company, and is actually engaged in the business of manufacturing, is to be decided upon the proofs. The court will look at its title, its articles of association or charter, and the provisions of the statute under which the incorporation has been effected. If these do not effectually settle the character of the company, recourse must then be had to the business organization, the character of the plant, and the actual business entered upon. Applying these tests to this case, we could not hold that the company was organized for mining, or for any purpose other than that of manufacturing. It has shown by its name, its legal organization, the statute under the provisions of which it was incorporated, and by its whole course of corporate conduct, that it was organized for manufacturing iron and steel, and for no other purpose. It is therefore, within the words and the spirit of the Act of 1889, a manufacturing company, and as such entitled to exemption from taxation on its capital stock. Having reached this conclusion, we congratulate ourselves upon being able to do in this case that which it is rarely in our power to do, reverse a judgment of the court below with the cordial approval of the court by which the judgment was rendered.

The judgment is reversed, and judgment is entered in favor of the defendant below, on the findings of the learned trial judge and the evidence.

(187 Pa. 507.)

The exercise of the power to mine its own coal by a manufacturing corporation to supply itself in part with the raw material used by it does not defeat the exemption of the capital stock of the manufacturing company from taxation, under the Act of 1889, but requires such exemption to be limited to that part of the capital which is used exclusively in manufacturing.

(October 2, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Dauphin County which confirmed a tax account against defendant's capital stock, which had been settled by the auditor-general and state treasurer. Reversed.

Defendant claimed to be exempt from taxation under the provisions of the Act of June 1, 1889, which provides: "The provisions of this section shall not apply to the taxation of the capital stock of corporations, limited partnerships, and joint-stock associations organized exclusively for manufacturing purposes and actually carrying on manufacturing within the state, except companies engaged in the brewing or distilling of spirituous or malt liquors, and such as enjoy and exercise the right of eminent domain."

The court below refused to recognize the exemption and entered judgment against defendant for the full amount of the tax.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Lyman D. Gilbert, John H. Weiss and M. M. Cochran, for appellant:

When the legislature in the twenty-first section of the Revenue Act of 1889 exempted from taxation the capital stock of corporations, it had in view companies having a franchise for mining coal and included them within the tax exemption.

Com. v. Northern Electric L. & P. Co. 14 L. R. A. 107, 145 Pa. 105.

The court did not exempt that portion of the capital stock of the appellant which was employed in strictly manufacturing operations. To this partial measure of right the appellant is undoubtedly entitled.

Com. v. Lackawanna Iron & Coal Co. 129 Pa. 846.

Messrs. W. U. Hensel, Atty-Gen., and James A. Stranahan, Deputy Atty-Gen., for the Commonwealth.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves a question not settled by Com. v. Pottsville Iron & Steel Co., ante, 228, which has just been decided. In that case a power had been conferred upon a manufacturing company to mine its raw materials, but when the company came to make its investments and organize its business it discarded this power, and arranged to supply itself with its materials and fuel by purchase. We held in that case that the mere possession of a power ancillary to its manufacturing business, which had never been used, and the use of which had been effectually declined by the character of its business organization, did not deprive a manufacturing company of the exemption of its capital stock from taxation under the proviso in the Act of 1889. In this case we have the power to mine coal for the manufacture of coke, and we have the continued use of this power as a means of providing itself with the coal from which the coke is made. The production of coke from coal is a process of manufacture. The production of coal by removing it from its bed and bringing it to the surface is a process of mining. They have no necessary connection. The legislature has seen fit to separate and classify corporate powers, and to confer upon one class of corporations an exemption from taxes which other classes are required to pay. Manufacturing companies must purchase their supplies in the market. It may be convenient for them to produce their raw material, as in the case of the appellant, and the denial of the power to do so may work some inconvenience, and increase the cost of the manufactured article; but the exemption is conferred upon the manufacturer, as distinguished from the mining, the transportation, the storage, or other business agency employed in handling the raw material—the fuel—and other supplies required by the manufacturer. It ought not to be extended so as to cover operations outside the legitimate processes of manufacturing. We are in this case to determine, therefore—First, whether the appellant is a manufacturing company; next, whether, if a manufacturing company, it is using any part of its capital in such a manner as to infringe upon the field occupied by corporations that are required to pay taxes on their capital stock. We understand from the findings of the court below and from the evidence that this company was organized as a manufacturing company, and has been steadily engaged in the manufacture of coke. We understand that it has the power to mine its own coal, and has in fact done so from the first, and that it has in this way supplied itself in part with the raw material it has used. This, as we have held in Com. v. Pottsville Iron & Steel Co., supra, does not strip it of its character as a manufacturing company, or of the protection which the law has extended to manufacturers. But, on the other hand, the fact that its business is manufacturing will not enable it to bring under the protection of its privilege any ancillary line of business in which it may find it economical or convenient to engage or cover the employment of its capital for any other than strictly manufacturing purposes. What, then, is the situation of the appellant? It is in name, in business purposes, and in product prepared for the market, a manufacturing company. In the conduct of its manufacturing business it seeks to cheapen its raw material, and thereby the cost of its product, by mining the coal it consumes. This is not necessary to the process of manufacture, though it may be both economical and convenient for the manufacturer. It is therefore the employment of part of its capital for a purpose not within the letter or the spirit of the exemption. As to so much of its capital it is subject to taxation, precisely as though no exemption existed. The use of the word "exclusively" in the proviso in the Act of 1889, given the office we have assigned to it in the Pottsville Iron & Steel Co. Case, does not stand in the way of our conclusion in this case. It was intended, as we there held, to discriminate between companies organized for the conduct of two or more lines of business simultaneously and such as were organized for the purpose of manufacturing. A company incorporated for the latter purpose will not lose its character or its privileges because of an effort to supply itself with what it needs for its manufacturing business in some cheaper way than by purchase. Such effort, and the reservation of the power to make it, are in aid of the purposes of the company as a manufacturer. Neither as to the public nor the commonwealth is it a change of organization or of business. Whether the appellant mines its coal or buys it makes no difference with its product, except as to its cost. In either case it makes and it sells coke, and nothing else. It is not a mining company. It neither sells coal nor offers it for sale. It simply seeks to provide itself by mining, instead of purchase, with the coal needed for its ovens. This, as we have seen, is such a use of a part of its capital as takes the sum so used out from under the exemption provided by the Act of 1889, and subjects it to taxation in the same manner and at the same rates that other capital so employed is subject to. This is a proper case for apportionment. The appellant is entitled to exemption as a manufacturing company. Upon so much of its capital as is employed in the effort to supply itself with coal it must pay taxes.

The judgment is reversed, and record remitted, that the apportionment may be made.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

William M. CARNEY et al., Appts.,

v.

Jesse HADLEY et al.

*1. As a general rule two conditions must concur to give a court of equity jurisdiction to enjoin a mere trespass on property: First, the complainant's title must be admitted, or legally established; and, second, the trespass must be of such a nature as to cause irreparable damage, not susceptible of complete pecuniary compensation. The inadequacy of the legal remedy is the foundation and indispensable prerequisite for the interposition of chancery in such cases, for the reason that a legal remedy has been devised to redress such wrongs, NOTE.—Injunction against trespass to cut timber.

Injunctive relief seems to have been granted quite early in cases of waste, but the courts declined for a long time to extend the relief to cases in which there was no privity between the parties and which were therefore cases of trespass simply.

In Mogg v. Mogg, 2 Dick. 670, in which the defendant, with absolutely no right, persuaded tenants to cut down timber, the chancellor refused an injunction on the ground that defendant was a trespasser, and as such liable to an action at law.

In Smith v. Collyer, 8 Ves. Jr. 80, where plaintiffs were in receipt of the rents, claiming as devisees, and the defendants were cutting timber, claiming and so long as this remedy is adequate, equity has no right to interfere.

2. The practice of granting injunctions in cases of trespass, it seems, is more liberal now than it was formerly, but a clear case of the inadequacy of the legal remedy must still be shown in order to justify the interference of the court of chancery.
3. While insolvency alone of the defendant may not be sufficient to authorize an injunction, yet it is an important element in many cases in determining whether or not a court of chancery should act in granting injunctions.
4. In cases of repeated trespasses where it becomes necessary to quiet a rightful, admitted, or established possession, chancery has often interposed to prevent a multiplicity of suits, although there may be a remedy at law. This court will not, however, grant an injunction against one person merely because he is guilty of repeated trespasses, where the legal remedy affords an adequate and complete redress in damages. The rule seemingly well sustained by authority is that before a court of chancery will interfere to prevent a multiplicity of suits, there must be several persons controverting the same right, and each standing upon his own pretension of right.

as heirs-at-law, the court said that the title of plaintiffs being denied, the case was trespass and not waste upon the showing of the parties, and the right being disputed, no order was issued in the case.

In Courthorpe v. Mappleaden, 10 Ves. Jr. 290, in which the person cutting the timber was acting in collusion with the tenant and the suit was by the landlord, the court said that the trespass partakes of the nature of waste and that therefore the injunction could be granted. In that case the somewhat similar case of Hamilton v. Worsefold, in which an injunction was granted by Lord Thurlow, is cited.

But in Crookford v. Alexander, 15 Ves. Jr. 188, the defendant had obtained possession under a contract to purchase and the court was inclined to treat the case as one of trespass, and granted the injunction although from the facts of the case it seems that it might have been treated as a case of waste.

And in Lowndes v. Bettie, 33 L. J. Ch. 451, it is said that the tendency of the decisions is to break down the distinction between trespass and waste.

The injunction was issued in Kelly v. Robb, 58 Tex. 377.

Courts conservative in extending relief.

The principles upon which the courts will act in granting an injunction to prevent cutting trees are not yet settled. Some courts have granted the relief in cases where other courts have said it was not appropriate, but the general tendency is to be conservative in extending the use of the writ.

If the cutting of timber is a simple act of trespass for which there may be adequate remedy at law, injunction will not lie. Wilson v. Hughell, Morris (Iowa) 451; Cowles v. Shaw, 2 Iowa, 496.

The injunction will not be granted to restrain a mere trespass, if it is not shown that the wrong is not abundantly capable of compensation in damages by ordinary suit at law. Hatcher v. Hampton, 7 Ga. 49.

Injunction will not lie in case of an ordinary trespass upon land and cutting down timber, where the plaintiff is in possession and has an adequate and complete remedy at law,—at least where there

5. Whenever the complainant's title is disputed in cases of trespass, a court of equity will not interfere by injunction on the ground of a multiplicity of suits until he has successfully established his title by trial at law.

6. Where the alleged trespass or threatened injury is to trees standing on land, in order to justify the granting of an injunction by a court of equity, it must appear that the trees are of such peculiar value and importance to the estate as that the alleged injury to them will so affect the uses and purposes for which the estate was designed as to make the injury to them an irreparable loss to the owner. An allegation that the trees are valueless except for turpentine and timber, and without them in a condition to produce turpentine and timber, the land would be of little value, and that the acts of defendants in extracting turpentine from the trees greatly lessens their value as timber producing trees, does not show that the injury complained of amounts to a destruction of the estate, or that the injury done could not be adequately compensated in damages. This was the rule prior to the enactment of section 1460, Revised Statutes.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Escambia County is nothing so special and peculiar as to call for such relief. Stevens v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 318, 1 L. ed. 155.

The injunction will not issue if it appears that the trees have no peculiar value and that adequate compensation for their destruction may be obtained at law. Powell v. Rawlings, 38 Md. 230.

Where plaintiff is in possession and the person cutting the timber is an utter stranger, not claiming under color of right, the tendency is not to grant an injunction, unless there be special circumstances, but to leave the plaintiff to his remedy at law; but if the acts tend to a destruction of the estate, an injunction may be granted. Lowndes v. Bettie, 33 L. J. Ch. 451.

An injunction will not lie to prevent the commission or repetition of a trespass in entering and cutting down timber on land of which the plaintiff is in possession as owner and has adequate remedy at law for the trespass, there appearing nothing in the case so especial or peculiar as to call for that particular relief. Thomas v. James, 32 Ala. 723.

In Hanson v. Gardiner, 7 Ves. Jr. 305, an injunction to prevent the cutting of timber by defendants, who claimed some rights to common of estovers, was dissolved, where it appeared that the plaintiff had brought an action to prevent the alleged unlawful acts and had permitted himself to be nonsuited and had subsequently recognised the claimed rights on the part of the defendants in a negotiation with defendants to compensate them for shutting them out.

A bill to enjoin a trespass is fatally defective if it does not aver a good title in the plaintiff, contains no charge of insolvency against defendants, and does not show that irreparable damage would result if the injunction is denied. Western M. & M. Co. v. Virginia Cannel Coal Co., 10 W. Va. 250.

An allegation in the complaint that at a certain time the defendants commenced cutting wood and that they "threaten and intend, as the complainants believe, to cut down and take away very large quantities of wood and timber," is not sufficient to cause an interference by injunction. Cornelius v. Post, 9 N. J. Eq. 196.

The injunction will not be granted where there has been nothing excepting threats on the part of in favor of complainants in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from committing certain alleged trespasses on complainants' land. Reversed.

Statement by Mabry, J.:

This is a bill for an injunction filed by appellees against appellants. The bill alleged that complainants were the owners in fee of a certain tract of land situated in Escambia county, Florida, consisting of six hundred and forty acres, described by metes and bounds, and known as the Benjamin Hadley, or Richland Pond, tract, and that they and Benjamin Hadley, under whom they claim title as heirs, had been in possession of this land with interruptions for more than sixty years, and were then in possession; that said land was very thickly studded with pitch pine trees of large size and of great value, and that defendant Carney and his foreman Gilchrist and Carmichael have from time to time, during two years prior to filing the bill, trespassed upon the said land for the purpose of boxing the trees, and thereby producing turpentine which they have removed from said trees and from said land; that not only does the removal of the turpentine from said trees and land deprive complainants of the said turpentine and the value thereof, but its extraction from said trees greatly lessens the value of the same as timber producing trees, and except for the purpose of the production of turpentine and timber said trees are valueless; that said trees constitute in large part the value of said land, and without them in a condition to be made valuable for turpentine and timber the said land is of little value; that the trespasses of respondents are continuous and frequent, and they threaten not only to trespass in the future upon said land for the purpose of removing turpentine already collected in boxes on the trees, but from time to time to trespass for the purpose of boxing and re-scraping said trees; and that said respondents reside in the state of Alabama and are possessed of no property of any kind in the state of Florida, and unless they are restrained from their said repeated and innumerable trespasses, complainants are remediless, save by repeated, vexatious, and multiplied suits against respondents, which would be fruitless in the state of Florida because of their alleged want of property in this state. The bill prays among other things for an order restraining the defendant. Griffin v. Winne, 10 Hun, 571; Woods v. Kirkland, 3 La. Ann. 397.

The injunction may be awarded if there is no adequate remedy at law.

Subject to some disagreement as shown below as to how far the title must be first settled, the general rule is that equity will aid by injunction if there is no adequate remedy at law. There is, however, some further disagreement as to when there is and when there is not such remedy.

In Kerlin v. West, 4 N. J. Eq. 452, it is said that in applying the principle of injunctive protection to woodland it is not always easy to discriminate between the mere trespass and the irreparable mischief which may destroy the inheritance or jeopard its value; that being done the case is clear.

To justify the interposition of an injunction the threatened injury must be irreparable. Leininger's App. 106 Pa. 398.

The injunction will not issue if it is not shown that the trespass is destructive of the estate. McMillan v. Ferrell, 7 W. Va. 223.

An injunction will lie to prevent the cutting down of trees on the boundary line of two adjoining owners, if such conduct would cause irreparable injury to the complaining party. Musch v. Burkhart, 13 L. R. A. 484, 88 Iowa, 301.

In West Point Iron Co. v. Beymert, 45 N. Y. 708, timber is placed in a class of subjects which the court said are protected by injunction, upon the ground that injuries to and depredations upon them are or may cause irreparable damage, and also with a view to prevent a multiplicity of actions for damages that might accrue from a continuous violation of the rights of the owners.

The fact that the damage is charged to be almost instead of absolutely irreparable will not defeat the injunction. Davis v. Reed, 14 Md. 152.

When remedy at law is inadequate.

If complainant has bought land in proximity to his mill for the timber trees it contains and an action at law cannot be tried before defendant has stripped the land of the trees, injunction may be granted, because the loss of the use of the mill and the profits cannot be recovered at law. Wadsworth v. Goree (Ala.) April 12, 1893.

If plaintiff is a married woman and seeks to restrain defendant from cutting timber on lands belonging to her separate estate under a license from her husband as trustee, there is not an adequate remedy at law and an injunction will be issued. Thomas v. James, 32 Ala. 723.

If a farm contain a small tract of woodland, the preservation of which is necessary for the proper use of the farm, as well as a building site for the owner's residence, many of the trees being large and of ancient growth, the destruction of them by a naked trespasser, without title or claim of right leaving the owner without wood, shade, or proper building site, is ground for an injunction. Powell v. Cheshire, 70 Ga. 357.

Destroying the fruit and ornamental trees and shrubbery around a dwelling house in a city is irreparable damage. Wilson v. Mineral Point, 39 Wis. 160.

Injunction will lie to restrain a trespasser from cutting the trees growing on the only wood-lot owned by the plaintiff, when it works a permanent injury to the land,—especially when there is no denial of the allegation of irreparable injury. Smith v. Rook, 59 Vt. 232.

Acts which will result in the destruction of all the timber on a man's home plantation, where wood and timber are necessary to the enjoyment of the property in that character will justify an injunction. Davis v. Reed, 14 Md. 152.

Where the land belongs to complainant and is occupied by him as a dwelling plantation containing timber particularly valuable to the estate, defendants will be enjoined from clearing up the timber land and converting it into waste and pasture land. Shipley v. Ritter, 7 Md. 408, 61 Am. Dec. 371.

To warrant the injunction, it must appear that the trees have a peculiar value, or are of great importance to the estate,—as that they are fruit or ornamental trees, or, if timber and wood, that the enjoyment of the estate will be so affected by their destruction as to make the damage irreparable. Green v. Keen, 4 Md. 93.

Cutting maple timber which is the chief value of the estate, is irreparable injury within the power of equity to prevent. Butman v. James, 34 Minn. 547.

appellants from trespassing upon the said land for the purpose of boxing or scraping or otherwise injuring the trees upon said land, and from removing the turpentine already in the boxes on the same.

The injunction as prayed for was granted, and respondents answered the bill. The answer denies the allegation that complainants were the owners of the said tract of land, or any part of it, or that they or any of them were then in possession of the same, or have at any time been in possession except for a few days during the month of March, 1888, when they or their agents went upon a portion of said land, but were notified that they were trespassers by Carney, one of the respondents, or his agent, and they shortly thereafter left said premises and have not since made any effort to take possession of same; that said land was deeded December 18, 1820, by Benjamin Hadley, the ancestor through whom complainants claim title, for valuable consideration to one William Denman, and the same has never been reconveyed to said Hadley or his heirs; that said land belongs to and is the property of William M. Carney, one of the respondents, and that he is in possession of same as owner and adversely to all others, and has been so in possession since the 31st day of August, 1882, when the same was deeded to him by John D. Reilly for valuable consideration, and said deed was duly recorded on the 16th day of February, 1883. Further, that when said Reilly executed said deed he was in actual possession of said land as owner thereof under a deed conveying same to him by James J. Milstead, bearing date March 27, 1852, and that he (Reilly) had been in possession of the said land since the date of said deed; that said Milstead at the time of making said deed to Reilly was in possession of said land under chain of title from said William Denman, to whom Benjamin Hadley had conveyed.

The allegation that respondents were without property in the state of Florida is denied, and it is averred that Carney, one of them, owns about six thousand acres of land in Escambia county, Florida, and further, that a suit for damages alleged to have been sustained by complainants by reason of the alleged trespasses on the part of respondents was then pending between said parties in Escambia county, Alabama. It is also alleged that the matters contained in complainants' bill are determinable at law, and do

The destruction of forest and other trees is an irreparable injury from which parties may be restrained by injunction. De la Croix v. Villere, 11 La. Ann. 39.

Cutting timber on land is an irreparable injury, where it constitutes the chief value of the property. Shreve v. Black, 4 N. J. Eq. 177.

But it has been held that cutting off the timber from a tract of pine land, valuable only or chiefly for the wood on it, is not such a case of irreparable mischief as will warrant the granting of an injunction. West v. Walker, 3 N. J. Eq. 279.

A plaintiff in possession who has reserved for preservation some young growing walnut trees may maintain a suit for injunction against a mere trespasser who is attempting to cut them down. Thatcher v. Humble, 37 Ind. 44.

But in Dunkart v. Rinehart, 37 N. C. 224, it was held that the cutting and carrying away of walnut trees does not of itself show irreparable injury.

In some of the cases the insolvency of defendant in addition to the acts which he is committing may render the remedy at law inadequate when the acts themselves would not do so.

Thus an allegation that a trespasser is about to commit irreparable injury by boxing and working turpentine trees and by cutting timber and making staves, leaving the land fit only to be cultivated for its products, without an averment of the defendant's insolvency, is insufficient. Gause v. Perkins, 56 N. C. 177, 69 Am. Dec. 728.

So it is said that to warrant the injunction the defendant must be insolvent or the injury irreparable, so that adequate compensation cannot be obtained at law. Hillman v. Hurley, 33 Ky. 628.

Cutting timber on the land of another without color of title may be enjoined as a destructive trespass, if the defendant is insolvent and the injunction is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits. Echert v. Ferst, 10 Phila. 514.

The mere fact that the timber on the land is needed for developing the minerals lying under it, and that there is no other timber in the neighborhood and no means of easily obtaining any, is not sufficient to warrant an injunction, if it is not shown that defendant is not peculiarly responsible for the damage done. Heaney v. Butte & M. C. Co. 10 Mont. 590.

Multiplicity of suits.

The circumstances may be such as to justify the injunction to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

The injunction may be allowed for the purpose of preventing a multiplicity of suits, where one action at law has been decided in favor of the complainant and another action is pending in which the same question is raised. Livingston v. Livingston, 6 Johns. Ch. 500, 2 L. ed. 198.

But it has been held that the fact that the trespasser is guilty of continued and repeated trespasses will not authorize an injunction to prevent a multiplicity of suits. Hatcher v. Hampton, 7 Ga. 49.

Where plaintiff, the owner of agricultural land containing an orchard of fruit trees and also ornamental trees and shrubbery, had recovered two verdicts against a mining company for entering upon the land and destroying the trees in their mining operations, the court granted an injunction against further trespasses on the ground that the plaintiff was not obliged to take the money for the property destroyed. Daubenspeck v. Gear, 18 Cal. 444.

The question of possession or title.

The influence of the conservative tendency of the courts has created some confusion as to what must be the state of the title or possession in order to warrant the relief. On the one side it is held that the action will not lie, unless it is shown that plaintiff is not only entitled to the possession, but that he is in actual possession. Hillman v. Hurley, 33 Ky. 628.

Also the injunction cannot be sustained if the complainant fails to show title in himself. Tate v. Vance, 27 Gratt. 571.

Also if plaintiff fails to show that he has the title to the land or the possession of it, the injunction will not issue. Wearin v. Munson, 62 Iowa, 466.

But on the other side in Hicks v. Michael, 15 Cal. 116, the court seems to regard it as settled that a plaintiff out of possession may have an injunction to prevent waste of the estate, even before he brings his action at law; but it is stated that ordinarily the injunction will not be granted before a hearing on the merits, except in cases of urgent necessity or when the subject-matter of the com-not constitute any ground for relief in a court of equity, and pray the same advantage by their answer as if they had demurred to said bill.

Respondents moved to dissolve the injunction because the material allegations of the bill had been denied, and at a subsequent date moved to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill for want of jurisdiction in the court appearing upon the face of the record. The motions to dissolve were refused and the case proceeded regularly to final hearing, when upon the pleadings and proofs a final decree was rendered adjudging complainants to be the owners of the land in question, and that the respondents and their agents and attorneys be perpetually enjoined from going upon said land to box or scrape the pine trees thereon or to remove any turpentine therefrom, and from committing any acts of trespass on the land. Respondents appealed.

Messrs. Mallory & Maxwell for appellants.

No appearance for appellees.

Mabry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

According to the allegations of the bill before us, the acts, against the doing of which an injunction was sought and obtained, amounted to a trespass upon real estate. This trespass, according to the bill, consisted in entering upon land of complainants, boxing the pine trees standing thereon for the production of turpentine and the removal of the turpentine from the trees and the land. The case arose and was determined in the circuit court before the enactment of chapter 3884, Laws of 1890, and must be disposed of independently of the provisions of that Act.

Courts of equity do not ordinarily extend the harsh remedy of injunction to cases of trespass, but leave the redress of such grievances to the courts of law where originally jurisdiction in such matters was lodged. It is said that originally courts of equity did not grant injunctions to restrain trespasses in any case, but whether in analogy to the remedy to prevent waste, or to prevent injuries supposed not to be adequately recompensed by damages in the legal forum, it is now plaint is free from controversy, or irreparable injury will be produced by its continuance.

So if an heir is in possession disputing the validity of the will, he may be restrained, pending proceedings to determine the validity of the will, from cutting timber, which amounts to spoliation. Fingal v. Blake, 2 Molloy, 50.

But if the defendant is in possession and building in the ordinary course of agriculture, the injunction will not issue merely on the ground that he is insolvent. Thompson v. Williams, 54 N. C. 173.

So where a defendant is in possession, and a plaintiff claiming possession seeks to restrain him from cutting timber, the court will not interfere, unless the acts amount to such flagrant instances of spoliation as to justify the court in departing from the general rule. Lowndes v. Bettle, 33 L. J. Ch. 451.

And if a person claiming ownership seeks to recover land from one in possession, before he can enjoin the cutting and boxing of turpentine trees by the latter, he must show that defendant is unable to respond in damages. McCormick v. Nixon, 33 N. C. 113.

So it has been held that a denial of the plaintiff's title defeats the suit.

The allegation of an adverse claim by defendant to the land presents an obstacle to injunctive relief; especially when no suit at law is pending or offered to be brought to establish the plaintiff's right. West v. Walker, 3 N. J. Eq. 273.

Where there is a contest between the parties for the possession of the land, each claiming the legal title, and the answer fairly meets every material allegation of the complaint and denies insolvency, the injunction will not be granted to restrain the working of turpentine trees. Bell v. Chadwick, 71 N. C. 323.

Although it has been held that in a suit for injunction to prevent the cutting down of trees, the bill may be read as an affidavit to contradict the answer. Lloyd v. Heath, 45 N. C. 41.

The injunction will not be granted if it appears from the pleadings that the title to the premises is disputed, and the facts do not show that the damage would be irreparable. Schoonover v. Bright, 24 W. Va. 406.

An injunction will not be issued, in a suit by the United States to annul a railroad land grant, to prevent the cutting of timber on the land in dispute prior to a judgment of forfeiture, if the pleadings in the case set out facts which, if proved, will sustain the title in the railroad company. United States v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 55 Fed. Rep. 569.

But it has been said that where a person in possession seeks to restrain one who claims by an adverse title, the tendency is to grant an injunction, at least if the acts done either constitute or tend to constitute a destruction of the estate. Lowndes v. Bettle, 33 L. J. Ch. 451.

It has been held that a defendant in possession under color of title will not be disturbed.

A defendant having color of title to the property and being in possession will not be enjoined from cutting timber therefrom pending an action to try the title. Shreve v. Black, 4 N. J. Eq. 177.

Defendants will not be restrained from cutting timber pending a suit to try the title, if their answer shows that the title has been in litigation for many years, and that they have maintained their right to the property during all that time. Cornelius v. Post, 9 N. J. Eq. 196.

The injunction will not be granted if the defendant is in possession claiming exclusive title and was in the actual possession at the time that plaintiff acquired his right. Powers v. Heery, R. M. Charl. (Ga.) 523.

Preventing waste pending litigation.

Some of the cases have, however, manifested a tendency to impound the subject-matter of a litigation and preserve it in statu quo whenever such relief has been asked.

If the title is in dispute equity may, in its discretion, enjoin the cutting of timber upon the premises until the question of title has been settled. Griffith v. Hilliard, 64 Vt. 643.

It is not necessary that the legal title should be established before the aid of equity is sought, but if the bill sets out that an action has been, or is about to be, instituted for the purpose of establishing the title, an injunction may be issued to preserve the subject-matter of the action. Gause v. Perkins, 56 N. C. 177, 69 Am. Dec. 723.

The injunction will be granted to preserve the estate pending a suit to try the title. Shubriok v. Guerard, 2 Decauss. Eq. 616.

Where there is a controversy pending in equity involving the title to land, an injunction may be granted to restrain the commission of waste pendfirmly settled that injunctions will be granted to restrain trespasses under certain conditions. The inadequacy of the legal remedy is the foundation and indispensable prerequisite for the interposition of chancery in such matters for the obvious reason that a legal remedy has been devised to redress such wrongs, and so long as the law provides an adequate remedy, equity has no right to interfere. The general rule, as has often been stated, is that in order to give the court of equity jurisdiction to enjoin torts to property, two conditions must concur: First, the complainant's title must be admitted, or be established by a legal adjudication; and, second, the threatened injury must be of such a nature as will cause irreparable damage, not susceptible of complete pecuniary compensation. The courts have generally accepted the statement of the rule here given as correct, although they have encountered considerable difficulty in its application to the facts of the various cases that have arisen out of the complication of human transactions. Jerome v. Ross, 7 Johns. Ch. 315, 2 L. ed. 305, 11 Am. Dec. 484; Gause v. Perkins, 56 N. C. 177, 69 Am. Dec. 728; McMillan v. Ferrell, 7 W. Va. 223; Citizens Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 209; Echelkamp v. Schrader, 45 Mo. 505; Hamilton v. Ely, 4 Gill, 84; Catching v. Terrell, 10 Ga. 578; Frederick v. Groshon, 80 Md. 436; Indian River S. B. Co. v. East Coast Transp. Co. 28 Fla. 387. To authorize the issuance of the writ of injunction by a court of chancery the injury threatened must be of such a peculiar nature that compensation in money cannot atone for it. The view expressed by Chancellor Kent is, that "it must be a strong and peculiar case of trespass, going to the destruction of the inheritance, or where the mischief is remediless, to entitle the party to the interference of this court by injunction." Jerome v. Ross, supra. In one case of cutting timber where the petition alleged that the defendants were continuing the trespass with a view to carrying away the timber, and that they intended, if not restrained, to take and carry away the timber (converted into cord wood) from the premises, and so dispose of it as to put it beyond the reach of petitioners, the court in holding this not to be sufficient, said: "We do not say that there may not be cases where the legal remedy would be incomplete, and in which an injunction might properly issue. For instance, as above suggested, the defendants might be entirely insolvent; the trespass might grow into a nuisance or waste; numberless suits might have to be brought, in order to make the remedy complete; the trespass might be by a party occupying a fiduciary relation; or the injury of such a character that the loss would be irreparable, and not be compensated in dollars and cents; and in any such, or similar cases, an injunction might be proper." Cowles v. Shaw, 2 Iowa, 496. It is apparent that quite a field for the exercise of chancery powers is here opened up, and many cases show that this court has extended its jurisdiction in the directions indicated. It is said that a more liberal practice prevails now in granting injunctions than obtained formerly. But the rule seems to have been adhered to, however, in the cases, that a clear case of the inadequacy of ing the suit for the preservation of the estate. Green v. Keen, 4 Md. 98.

An injunction is proper to preserve the estate for the benefit of those ultimately entitled to it. Fulton v. Harman, 44 Md. 251.

Complainants in possession may, pending proceedings to determine the validity of an alleged title claimed by defendants, who are unable to respond in damages for the trespasses committed, restrain the stripping of the land of its timber which constitutes its chief value. Sullivan v. Rabb, 86 Ala. 423.

Where trees standing in a lane were alleged by plaintiff to belong to his estate and to be extremely ornamental to the mansion house and park, and defendant claimed that the trees were standing on a part of the waste of a manor of which he was the lord, the injunction was granted to preserve the property until the title could be determined at law. Kinder v. Jones, 17 Ves. Jr. 109.

Where complainants and those under whom they claim had been in possession for many years defendants, who were peculiarly irresponsible, were enjoined from selling off from the premises wood and timber which constituted their chief value, although defendant had brought an action of ejectment to try the title to the property. Piper v. Piper, 38 N. J. Eq. 81.

In Duval v. Waters, 1 Bland, Ch. 569, 18 Am. Dec. 850, the chancellor says that it is general practice in Maryland to restrain a defendant in possession from committing waste by cutting timber pending an action at law to establish the title.

But in Hamilton v. Ely, 4 Gill, 84, it is said that it is not the established chancery doctrine to restrain the repetition of a mere trespass pending an action to try title.

And in another Maryland case in which the question was not as to the cutting of timber, it was decided that an injunction will not lie to restrain the commission of a mere trespass pending proceedings at law to try the right, except in cases of irreparable mischief, or to prevent a multiplicity of suits, or where peculiar circumstances imperatively demand such a conservative remedy. Amelung v. Seekamp, 9 Gill & J. 468.

If both parties claim title, both may be restrained from interfering with the land pending the settlement of the adverse claim. Johnson v. Hall, 33 Ga. 281.

In case of an application for an injunction against interference with the property on a mining claim, in which the issuance of the injunction was resisted on the ground that the title was in dispute, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "It is now common practice, in cases where irreparable injury is being done or threatened, going to the destruction of the substance of the estate, such as the cutting down of timber, to exercise the authority of the court to preserve the property from destruction, although the title is in litigation." Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 537, 23 L. ed. 1116.

And the same doctrine is announced in a case where the alleged trespass was the placing of buildings on the property, the court declaring that in cases where the title is in dispute, a stronger and clearer case of irreparable mischief must be presented than where the title is undisputed. LeRoy v. Wright, 4 Savy. 530.

In Wood v. Braxton, 54 Fed. Rep. 1005, it is said that the jurisdiction of equity by way of injunction to prevent the cutting of timber is of comparatively recent origin, but that it is now fully recognized and well established, and that if the nature the legal remedy must be shown in order to justify the interposition of the court of chancery by the harsh remedy of injunction.

The trespasses alleged in the bill under consideration consist in entering the land of complainants and boxing trees for the production of turpentine. These trespasses are alleged to be continuous and frequent, and that the defendants reside in the state of Alabama and have no property in this state; also, unless the said defendants be restrained from their repeated and innumerable trespasses, complainants were remediless save by repeated, vexatious, and multiplied suits which would be fruitless in this state because of the alleged want of property in this jurisdiction by the respondents. The answer positively denies the allegation in the bill that respondents were not possessed of any property in this state, and it is alleged that Carney, who is the only person asserting any claim to the land, owns at least six thousand acres in Escambia county, Florida. It seems that a suit for damages in reference to the subject-matter of this proceeding and between the same parties, is pending in Escambia county, Alabama. No effort was made on the part of appellees to establish the allegation that appellants were not possessed of any property in Florida, but the showing made by the latter is clear that Carney at the time of filing the bill was possessed of considerable real property situated in Escambia county, Florida, amounting to at least six thousand acres. Insolvency is an element in determining whether or not the court should act in granting an injunction in a case. In Gause v. Perkins, supra, it is said that the "injury must be of a peculiar nature, so that compensation in money cannot atone for it; where from its nature it may be thus atoned for, if in the particular case the party be insolvent, and on that account unable to atone for it, it will be considered irreparable." And in many of the cases where injunctions have been granted to restrain trespasses the insolvency of the trespasser has been an important element. Our court has said that insolvency alone of the defendant will not be sufficient to authorize an injunction. Pensacola & G. R. Co. v. Spratt, 12 Fla. 26, 91 Am. Dec. 747. Under the proof in the record before us insolvency cannot be claimed in support of the decree. The showing is that one of the respondents, and who is the real party in interest in the subject-matter of this suit, owns considerable property within the jurisdiction of the court, and liable to any judgment for damages that may be recovered against him.

In cases of repeated trespasses where it is necessary to quiet a rightful admitted or established possession, chancery has often interposed to prevent a multiplicity of suits, although there may be a remedy at law, and this is a well-recognized head of chancery jurisdiction when a proper case is presented. The court will not, however, grant an injunction against one person merely because he is guilty of repeated trespasses where the legal remedy affords an adequate and complete redress in damages. The rule, as stated by many decisions, is, that to justify the interference of a court of equity in cases of trespass in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits, there must be several persons controverting the same right, and each standing upon his own claim or pretension. Jerome v. Ross, supra; Hatcher v. Hampton, 7 Ga. 49; Nicodemus v. Nicodemus, 41 Md. 529; Thorn v. Sweeney, 12 Nev. 251; John A. Roebbing Sons' Co. v. First Nat. Bank of Richmond, 80 Fed. Rep. 744; High, Inf. § 700.

The bill is filed against Carney and two others alleged to be his foremen. Carney is the only person who is making any claim to the land as against appellees, and is the of the injury goes to the substance of the estate, equity will interfere without regard to the question of the insolvency of the defendant, and that this interference may take place to preserve the estate intact pending an appeal to a higher court from a judgment settling the title in one of the adverse parties.

But other courts have held that—

The mere fact that an ejectment suit is pending for possession of the land is not sufficient to warrant the court in enjoining defendant from cutting the timber and removing it from the land pending such suit. Cox v. Douglass, 20 W. Va. 175.

So the cutting of the timber will not be restrained pending a suit to establish the title, if the cutting is an ordinary use of the property and there is nothing to show that a money consideration will not give an adequate compensation for all the damage suffered by the prevailing party. John L. Roper Lumber Co. v. Wallace, 93 N. C. 22; Lewis v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. 98 N. C. 11.

Proceedings in equity cannot be maintained for the purpose of settling the question of the title to the land. Watson v. Ferrell, 34 W. Va. 406.

Statutory provisions.

Jurisdiction over trespass is given in certain cases by the Georgia Code. Powell v. Cheshire, 70 Ga. 267.

Under the North Carolina Act of 1885, chap. 401, it is not necessary to allege insolvency in case of the cutting or destruction of timber trees. John L. Roper Lumber Co. v. Wallace, supra.

Cutting timber on public land is waste, within the Washington Code, § 663, which provides that where there are opposing claimants to public land, and one is threatening to commit on such land waste which tends materially to lessen the value of the inheritance, and which cannot be compensated by damages, he may be enjoined therefrom. Arment v. Hensel, 5 Wash. 152.

Allegation of irreparable injury not sufficient.

Some of the courts have held that it is not sufficient for the bill to simply allege that the injury would be irreparable, but facts must be stated which will show that such will be the case. Thompson v. Williams, 54 N. C. 176; Bogey v. Shute, 54 N. C. 180.

The facts constituting the irreparable injury must be set out. Schoonover v. Bright, 24 W. Va. 698; Watson v. Ferrell, 34 W. Va. 406.

Interference with contract rights.

The vendors who have sold property may be enjoined from stripping the timber therefrom at the suit of the vendee. Smith's App. 69 Pa. 479.

One who has purchased the timber on a tract of land may enjoin a subsequent purchaser of the land with notice of his rights from cutting and removing the timber. Gress Lumber Co. v. Leitner (Ga.) July 24, 1893.

H. P. F.

sole moving agency in the alleged invasion of their rights. The other persons named are simply agents and servants, and they do not assert any claim to the land. What they do is for Carney and in his name, and the controversy in reference to the land is solely between appellees and appellant Carney. According to the rule just stated, there would be no occasion for the interference of chancery on account of the multiplicity of suits between the parties. But in addition to the rule mentioned, it seems to be clearly settled that whenever the complainant's title is disputed a court of equity will not interfere by injunction, or make perpetual an injunction already granted, on the ground of a multiplicity of suits, until he has procured his title to be established by a successful trial at law. The ground upon which this action is based is because as a general thing courts of equity do not try disputed legal titles to land. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 252; Poyer v. Des Plaines, 123 Ill. 111; Carlisle v. Cooper, 21 N. J. Eq. 576; Irwin v. Davidson, 38 N. C. 311; Caro v. Pensacola City Co. 19 Fla. 766. The answer shows that the title of appellees was disputed, and an examination of the testimony in the record does not dispel the presence of a serious issue between the parties as to the legal title to the land in question. In any view we take of the case there is nothing to help the final decree in favor of appellees on the ground of the right of the court to interfere on account of a multiplicity of suits.

But can the decree in favor of appellees making the injunction perpetual be supported on the ground that appellants were committing an irreparable injury within the meaning of the rule already stated? It is safe to say that even in cases of the destruction of timber by cutting and removing it from the land, it is not sufficient in order to obtain an injunction to simply allege that such cutting and removal amount to irreparable injury to the land, and a great damage and loss to the owner. In addition, it must appear that the trees are of such peculiar value and importance to the estate as that their destruction or injury will so affect the uses and purposes for which it is designed as to make their loss an irreparable injury to the owner. If adequate compensation can be made in money, the remedy is at law. In Green v. Keen, 4 Md. 98, the allegation as to the trespass was, in substance, that the defendant had entered upon the premises mentioned and had felled timber trees and other trees standing upon the land, and committed other and further waste thereon by driving wagons and other vehicles over the same, and had threatened to fell other timber trees on the land to its irreparable injury and to the great damage and loss of complainant. This was held not sufficient to authorize an injunction.

It was alleged in Shipley v. Ritter, 7 Md. 408, 61 Am. Dec. 371, that complainant's home, consisting of two hundred and forty acres, had on a part of it timber consisting of oak, chestnut, hickory, and other growth common to the country, and that it was "particularly valuable and desirable to complainant as timber land, so much so that it would be and is attended with irreparable injury for the same to be cut down and destroyed, or converted into pasture or waste land; that a portion of said timber land, and the portion which is in part the subject of the waste and destruction hereinafter complained of, is so situated in reference to complainant's house and outbuildings that it affords them protection and shelter from the severity of the seasons of summer and winter, besides being ornamental, and that on these accounts also the waste and destruction hereinafter set forth and complained of is attended with and is an irreparable injury to complainant." The trespass of entering upon and destroying the timber by defendants was also alleged. The same court held this bill to be sufficient for an injunction. The principle applied here is this—the trespass complained of went to the destruction of that which was essential to the value of the estate, and to the destruction of the estate itself, in the character in which it had been enjoyed. When such an injury is inflicted it is irreparable, in the meaning of the rule, and cannot be compensated by the legal remedy, and hence a court of chancery, ever ready to prevent an injustice, steps forward with its restraining power to prevent the threatened injury. The character of the injury as being capable of compensation, or such as is irreparable in its nature, is the distinguishing feature in determining the jurisdiction of chancery in such cases. West v. Walker, 8 N. J. Eq. 279; Thompson v. Williams, 54 N. C. 176; Powell v. Rawlings, 38 Md. 239; Thatcher v. Humble, 67 Ind. 444; Hatcher v. Hampton, supra; Thomas v. James, 32 Ala. 728; Hillman v. Hurley, 82 Ky. 626.

The averments of the bill in Gause v. Perkins, to which reference has already been made, were that most of the land was fit for little else than the production of turpentine, staves, and timber, and that defendant had entered upon the land by his agents and servants and boxed some 25,000 trees for producing turpentine, and had carried on the business of making turpentine on this land and carrying it off and selling the same in large quantities. Further, that he was overworking the trees, and in a few years they would be worn out, useless, and unfit for making turpentine, and defendant was at the time of filing the bill engaged in committing other wastes, spoil, and destruction upon the land, and was thus doing an irreparable injury to the land and would render the same utterly useless and valueless unless he was restrained by injunction. The court decided in this case that the boxing of pine trees for turpentine, and working them for such purpose, was not destruction, and that the court could not see that the injury would be irreparable unless it was shown that the defendant was insolvent, and, on that account, unable to atone for any injury that he might do the complainant. In another case, Beil v. Chadwick, 71 N. C. 329, where an injunction against working pine trees for turpentine was sought, the court said: "It should be a very clear case of trespass, and irreparable mischief, to justify a court in crippling the industry of the country and preventing the full development of our resources." As was said in a still later case, McCormick v. Nixon, 83 N. C. 113, the decisions in that state were placed upon the ground of justice to the party sought to be enjoined, and in obedience to public policy, which favors the use to which lands are adapted as means of developing the resources of the country. We have been unable to find any case holding that the simple working of pine trees for turpentine in the customary manner was irreparable injury, to prevent which a court of equity would grant an injunction. In Stevens v. Beekman, 1 Joins. Ch. 318, 1 L. ed. 155, the allegation, in effect, was that defendant had entered the premises, cut down and taken away timber, and that the part of the land on which such waste was committed, was principally, if not exclusively, valuable on account of the timber. This was held insufficient to sustain the injunction. So far as the loss of the turpentine is concerned, or damage to the trees in the production of turpentine, the bill entirely fails to exhibit a case of irreparable injury. It is made to appear that the trees are valueless except for turpentine and timber, and without them in a condition to produce turpentine and timber the land would be of little value; also that appellees were being deprived of the turpentine by reason of the acts of appellants. It does not appear from this that the working of the trees for turpentine will be a destruction of them, nor does it appear that the alleged injury is of such a nature as that it cannot be fully compensated in damages. There is an allegation in connection with the above, that the extraction of the turpentine from the trees greatly lessens their value as timber producing trees, but here again there is an absence of any clear showing that the injury resulting from the source amounts to a destruction of the estate, or is such as cannot be fully atoned for in money, and that a recovery for the damage done to the trees as timber in working them for turpentine would not be full and adequate for all the injury sustained. There is no special allegation of damage showing that pecuniary compensation will not compensate for all the loss.

The court we think was in error in not dissolving the injunction on final hearing, without reference to the question of appellees' title. The answer denied the title and possession of appellees, and on the proof it is contended by appellants that the court should have refused relief on the ground of want of title in appellees. What we have said disposes of the case, and we need not discuss the question of title.

The decree of the court should be reversed and it is so ordered.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Levi P. MORTON, Respt.,
v.
Mayor, etc., of NEW YORK, Appts.

(140 N. Y. 207.)

1. The legislative authority which will shelter an actual nuisance must be express, or a clear and unquestionable implication from powers conferred, certain and unambiguous, and such as to show that the legislature must have intended and contemplated the doing of the very act in question.
2. The right of a city to build a pumping station for waterworks on its own land so near the premises of a private owner that buildings subsequently erected by him will be made untenable by the noise and vibration of the pumping machinery, is not conferred, even if the legislature has power to confer it without compensation to him, by a general authority to locate necessary structures and machinery for the waterworks.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court,

First Department, reversing a judgment of the New York Circuit in their favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged depreciation of the value of plaintiff's property by reason of the operation of a pumping station by defendants on adjoining land. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Charles Blandy, with Mr. William H. Clark, for appellants:

The pumping station in question was erected and maintained under the direct authority and sanction of the legislature.

Laws 1878, chap. 386.

The plaintiff was bound to submit graciously to his inconvenience and damage, because the pumping station was a lawful structure engaged in doing work of a public character and for the public good. Damages from lawful acts cannot usually be made the basis of an action.

NOTE.—It is clear that courts in modern cases tend more and more to the protection of the rights of individuals as against the public, evidently mindful of the fact that the public, rather than a single individual, ought to bear the expense or loss by acts done for the benefit of the public. While the above case does not decide that the legislature could not authorize a nuisance to private property in the interest of the public without compensation to the owner of such property, it applies a strict rule of construction to the claim of such legislative authority. For brief reference to illustrations of the tendency above referred to, see notes to Forster v. Scott (N. Y.; 15 L. R. A. 543, and Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Birmingham, S. & T. R. R. Co. (Ala.) 15 L. R. A. 16a.

Pittsburgh & A. Bridge Co. 8 Watts & S. 85; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Coons, 6 Watts & S. 101; Re Philadelphia & T. R. Co. 6 Whart. 43, 36 Am. Dec. 202.

A municipal corporation, acting under the authority of its charter or of the general statute, cannot be subjected to a liability for damages arising from the exercise by it of the authority conferred, so long as the authority is properly exercised, and not exceeded, unless a statute or the fundamental law expressly gives a right to such damages.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The municipal authorities of the city of New York were empowered by chapter 886 of the Laws of 1878 to extend and enlarge the distribution of Croton water throughout the city, and for that purpose to raise and expend a sum of money not to exceed $1,500,000. The authority thus conferred is to be found in the second section of the Act, which reads as follows: "The commissioner of public works of the city of New York, when thereunto authorized by three-fourths vote of all the members elected to the common council of said city, to be approved by the mayor of said city, is hereby authorized to expend for materials and labor and other services in such manner as the said commissioner shall deem for the best interest of said city, in laying pipes to extend and enlarge the distribution of Croton water throughout the city of New York, including the two new wards, and to furnish a sufficient supply thereof to the institutions in charge of the department of public charities and correction, located on Blackwell's island, Ward's island and Randall's island, and in laying mains and erecting or constructing such structures and fixtures as the said commissioner of public works may deem necessary to deliver said water at higher levels and in greater quantities, an additional sum not exceeding $1,500,000." The common council and the commissioner of public works proceeded to execute the power conferred by this act, and erected upon certain lots owned by the city a building, in which were placed pumping engines, tank, and other fixtures, and laid the necessary mains and pipes to connect the points to be served with the source of supply. The object of the improvement was to supply water at higher elevations to the portions of the city built on high ground. The pumping station was constructed some time after the passage of the act, and in the year 1888 had been in operation some years. About this time there was erected a row of brick dwelling houses extending from the west wall of the pumping station westerly, twelve in number, which, on the 18th of July, 1888, were all conveyed to the plaintiff. The three houses nearest to the station are known as Nos. 116, 118, and 120; the first having been built close to the west line of the lot upon which the structures of the city had been placed. The injury for which the plaintiff complained was that, by reason of the operation of the pumps and machinery in the station, the noise and vibration therefrom greatly damaged the three houses next adjoining, rendering them untenable, or at least greatly diminishing the rental value. The vibration and noise affected the three houses in proportion to their proximity to the station. It is conceded by the learned counsel for the defendant that the plaintiff at the trial proved that the three houses were seriously affected by the action of the machinery in use in the pumping station, and that the vibrations and noise therefrom produced actual pecuniary loss to the plaintiff. There is no complaint of negligent management on the part of the municipal authorities, but the plaintiff's contention is that he was entitled to the use and enjoyment of the property which he owned free from such annoyance or loss. On the other hand, the defendant insists that it is not liable for the results of the injury, for the reason that it acted in the exercise of powers for public purposes conferred by express legislative authority. These positions assumed by the respective parties sufficiently disclose the nature of the legal question involved. The defendant's position was sustained by the trial court, and the complaint dismissed, but the general term has reversed the judgment.

The defendant, by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, could have taken such portion of the adjoining property as would enable it to conduct its operations without damage to what remained, and the owner would then be entitled to compensation. It may be a question worthy of consideration whether, upon the facts disclosed, the defendant's acts do not virtually amount to a taking without any compensation, to the extent of the damage caused; but a consideration of this feature of the case is rendered unnecessary by recent decisions of this court, which, when applied to the facts disclosed by the records, fully sustain the view taken by the learned general term. These cases have grafted upon the principle contended for in behalf of the defendant—that legal liability in damages cannot result from acts done by a corporation in the performance of a public duty by express legislative authority, resulting in consequential injury to others, and which as between individuals, would be regarded as a nuisance—an important limitation. It is that the authority which will shelter an actual nuisance must be express, or a clear and unquestionable implication from powers conferred, certain and unambiguous, and such as to show that the legislature must have intended and contemplated the doing of the very act in question. Hill v. New York, 139 N. Y. 495; Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas Light Co. 122 N. Y. 18, 9 L. R. A. 711; Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 10, 57 Am. Rep. 701.

The authorities cited show that this qualification of the general doctrine is founded in reason and justice, and that it is not by any means a new principle. It only remains to point out its application to this case. The legislature undoubtedly authorized the defendant to construct a building, and to place in it the necessary machinery to accomplish the purpose in view. But that is not the act complained of, or which produced the injury to the plaintiff's property. The wrong consisted in placing the building and machinery so near to the adjoining property as to injuriously affect it by the noise and vibration.

The city has a right to build upon its own land, but there was nothing in the statute that required it to place the structure where it did. It could perform every duty imposed by the statute by building the pumping station at such distance from the adjoining houses as to avoid the results of which the plaintiff justly complains. If it was not possible or practicable to do that upon the land that the defendant owned, then more could have been acquired for the purpose. The legislature did not select the place for the station, but the defendant did. A general authority to raise and expend money for the purpose of extending and enlarging the supply of water, and erecting the necessary structures and machinery for that purpose, is neither an express nor implied authority to construct a pumping station which adjoins the walls of another house, or block of houses, in such manner as to render them untenable by the noise and vibration. It was entirely possible to execute the statute without invading the property rights of others. General powers for the accomplishment of a general purpose were conferred upon the defendant, but no express or implied power or authority was conferred to do the very act complained of, nor can it be said that the legislature contemplated it. It is quite likely that all the power intended to be conferred by the statute was to enable the city to raise and expend the money for the purpose indicated. Aside from this power the city probably could, if it had the means, build the station under existing law, and without any additional legislation. But, however that may be, it cannot be said that the legislature contemplated the selection of such a place for the station that the operation of the pumps and machinery would inevitably expose private property to destruction or injury. The language of Chief Justice Marshall in United States v. Fisher, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 390, 2 L. ed. 314, is applicable: "Where rights are infringed, where fundamental principles are overthrown, where the general system of the laws is departed from, the legislative intention must be expressed with irresistible clearness to induce a court of justice to suppose a design to effect such objects." It is plain, we think, that the specific act of the defendant which resulted in the injury is not within the express words of the statute, or any necessary implication.

The order appealed from should therefore be affirmed, and judgment absolute ordered for the plaintiff, with costs.

All concur.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Caroline DAVENPORT, Appt.,

v.

George GWILLIAMS.

(133 Ind. 142.)

The general language of a deed with covenants sufficient to pass the estate of the grantor is not limited by a clause which recites that it is intended to convey absolutely all the interest of his wife who is named therein as one of the grantors but who has only an inchoate dower interest therein.

(September 14, 1892.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Benton County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate formerly owned by plaintiff's deceased husband, who had joined with his former wife in a deed which was alleged to have conveyed only her interest in the property. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Edwin P. Hammond, Matthew H. Walker, George H. Gray and William B. Austin, for appellant:

The deed to Whaples, as shown by the instrument itself and the circumstances surrounding its execution, was plainly intended to convey only the interest of the wife, Sarah, and, as she had only an inchoate interest as the wife of Joseph, the deed was a nullity and passed no title whatever.

Attempted conveyances convey nothing.

This is not an action to reform a deed. Appellee claims title under the deed as it is.

Hummelman v. Mounts, 87 Ind. 178.

The rule of construction, as between apparently repugnant clauses in a deed, is, that the meaning of general words are restrained by more specific and particular words. Under this rule the general words of conveyance in the granting part of the deed in controversy, which, standing alone, would be sufficient to convey the title of both Joseph and his wife, are qualified by the particular and specific words of the grant whereby it was declared to be the intent of the parties to convey the interest of Sarah.

NOTE.—On the construction of deeds several important recent cases have been reported in this series. As to condition for specified charitable public or quasi-public purpose, see Greene v. O'Connor (R. I.) 19 L. R. A. 262, and note.

The cardinal and fundamental rule of all construction is to ascertain the intention of the parties, and this intention is to be arrived at by taking the instrument as a whole and giving appropriate meaning to every clause and every word.

Bishop, Cont. § 384; Bassett v. Budlong, 77 Mich. 388; Ingalls v. Newhall, 139 Mass. 268.

If the full and entire intention of the parties does not appear from the words of the contract, and if it can be interpreted from any custom or usage of the place where it is made, that course is to be adopted.

Story, Conf. L. § 270; Jackson v. Myers, 8 Johns. 388, 8 Am. Dec. 504.

Nothing being disclosed in the record to the contrary, this court will presume that the common law prevailed in Connecticut when the Davenport deed was made.

1 Jones, Mortg. § 22; Chamberlain v. Thompson, 10 Conn. 243, 26 Am. Dec. 390.

By this law, the mortgagee held the legal title, was entitled to possession, and could maintain ejectment against the mortgagor. After condition broken, the mortgagor's estate was forfeited at law and his only remedy was, after tender of payment or demand for accounting, to apply to a court of equity to redeem.

With this law, believed by the parties to be applicable to the mortgage in question, it requires no fanciful imagination to grasp the situation of the parties as it appeared to them. The legal title, as it seemed to them, was in Whaples, Hunn's executor, who held the mortgage. The mortgage debt being past due, Joseph Davenport's title was forfeited. His only remedy was to go into a court of equity to redeem, which to him was no remedy at all, involving as an indispensable condition the payment of the mortgage debt. He had nothing to pay with. He was wholly without means. Then, as it appeared to Davenport and Whaples, the title of the former was to all intents and purposes gone, and was vested absolutely in the latter, subject to the inchoate dower of the wife who had not joined in the mortgage. All, as the parties thought, that was essential to make Whaples' title perfect was a deed conveying to him this inchoate interest. And this was plainly and manifestly the only object of the deed in controversy.

Had the law in Indiana been as the parties supposed, we are not prepared to say that the deed would have been ineffectual for the purpose intended, namely, to convey the interest of the wife alone, that of the husband having, as the parties believed, previously passed by the mortgage.

McCormick v. Hunter, 50 Ind. 186; Dunn v. Tousey, 80 Ind. 288.

The mistaken view of the parties respecting the law of Indiana by which the validity of the Davenport deed is to be tested, cannot change the legal effect of that instrument.

In executing the deed in controversy the parties used a printed blank, and all that portion of the deed, containing in general words the grant whereby it is claimed that the title of the husband was conveyed, is in print, while that portion in which specific and particular words are used, limiting the conveyance to the interest of the wife, is in writing. In such case, the written are given pre-eminence over the printed words in arriving at the intention of the parties.

Messrs. Coffroth & Stuart and Jay H. Adams for appellee.

McBride, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While several errors are assigned in this case, they all hinge upon the construction of the following deed: "To all people to whom these presents shall come, greeting: .

"Know ye, that we, Joseph Davenport and Sarah Davenport, his wife, of the town of West Hartford county of Hartford, and State of Connecticut, for the consideration of one dollar received to our full satisfaction of Shubael H. Whaples, of the town of Newington, in said county, executor of the will of Albert S. Hunn, deceased.

"Do give, grant, bargain, sell and confirm unto the said Shubael H. Whaples, executor as aforesaid, a certain piece of land situated in the county of Benton, State of Indiana, being the northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ section seventeen, and the east half of section eighteen, in the township number twenty-five, range seven west containing four hundred and eighty acres of land. Said premises were mortgaged by deed recorded in mortgage records book No. 9 at pages 131 and 132, by Joseph Davenport to said Albert S. Hunn, intending thereby to convey absolutely to said grantee as executor as aforesaid, all the interest of Sarah Davenport in said premises.

"To have and to hold the above granted and bargained premises with the appurtenances thereof unto the said grantee, his heirs and assigns forever to his and their own proper use and behoof. And also I the said grantors do for ourselves, our heirs, executors and administrators, covenant with the said grantee his heirs and assigns that at and until the unsealing of these presents we are well seised of the premises as a good, indefeasible estate in fee simple, and have right to bargain and sell the same in manner and form as is above written, and that the same is free from all incumbrances whatsoever.

"And furthermore we, the said grantors, do by these presents bind ourselves and our heirs forever to warrant and defend the above granted and bargained premises to him and the said grantee, his heirs and assigns against all claims and demands whatsoever, with the exception of such taxes as may have been assessed or become due since March 30, 1878.

"In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals this fourteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Seventy-nine.

"Joseph Davenport, (L. S.)

"Sarah Davenport. (L. S.)

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Henry Talcott, Sarah J. Bywater."

When the deed was executed Joseph Davenport was owner in fee of the land in controversy, subject to the mortgage referred to in the deed. Sarah Davenport owned no interest whatever therein, except her inchoate interest as his wife. We quote from the brief of counsel for the appellant their statement of the contention:

"The contention between the parties arises upon the construction of the Davenport deed to Whaples. Appellee claims that it was effective to convey Joseph Davenport's title. Appellant insists that its manifest purpose was to convey only the inchoate interest of Davenport's first wife, and that as her death occurred before that of her husband the deed was inoperative and void."

This argument rests upon the use by the parties of the words, "intending hereby to convey absolutely to said grantee as executor aforesaid all the interest of Sarah Davenport in said premises," which they insist are words of limitation, serving to limit the estate conveyed to the inchoate interest of the wife therein referred to. The construction contended for by the appellant would violate many well-settled rules for the construction of deeds. The purpose of all such rules is to ascertain the intention of the parties. Washb. Real Prop. *622-631.

A deed should if possible be so construed that some effect will be given it. It will be assumed that the parties did not intend that it should be a nullity, and did intend that it should be operative. It will be upheld, rather than defeated. 2 Parsons, Cont. 505; Irwin v. Kilburn, 104 Ind. 118; Gano v. Aldridge, 27 Ind. 294.

When it becomes necessary to resort to rules of construction to determine the meaning and purport of a deed because of any ambiguity in the terms used, that construction will be adopted which is most favorable to the grantee. Hunt v. Francis, 5 Ind. 802; Hackleman v. Henry County Comrs. 78 Ind. 162; 2 Parsons, Cont. supra.

It is also a cardinal rule in the construction of deeds that it be made on the entire deed, and not merely upon a particular part of it, and therefore every part of a deed ought, if possible, to take effect and every word to operate. Hilliard, Real Prop. 401; Williams v. Owen, 116 Ind. 70; Allen v. Holton, 20 Pick. 458.

If the words in controversy had been omitted from the deed there would have been no room for doubt as to its meaning. It is clear that the deed without them would have conveyed the entire interests of both grantors. Giving to that clause, however, the effect contended for by the appellant renders it inoperative and defeats it as a conveyance. The inchoate right of the wife in the lands of her husband is not a present estate. So long as the title of the husband remains vested in him such inchoate right alone cannot be conveyed. A deed which attempts to convey such inchoate right and no more, leaving the husband's title in him, is void. McCormick v. Hunter, 50 Ind. 186; Paulus v. Latta, 93 Ind. 34; Snoddy v. Leavitt, 105 Ind. 357; Hudson v. Eeans, 81 Ind. 596; Rupe v. Hazley, 118 Ind. 416.

Such construction is not that most favorable to the grantee, but is destructive of his interests. It assumes that the parties, with all the formalities attending the execution of a valid conveyance of land, executed a paper which conveys nothing and is a nullity. These words relate solely to the wife's interest in the land and declare the purpose of the parties to convey such interest to the grantee. The language previously used is ample to convey that interest. The words in question, while surplusage, are not contradictory of, nor are they inconsistent with any other portion of the deed. Treating them as surplusage, while it convicts the parties of using unnecessary and redundant language, acquits them of the charge of inconsistency and of making a void instrument. It upholds, instead of striking down the deed. The latter construction harmonizes all of the provisions of the deed, and is, in our opinion, the correct one.

The conclusion we have reached is in accordance with the judgment of the Circuit Court, and its judgment is therefore affirmed, with costs.

As regards the hindrance to the flow of surface water from its natural course no cause of action lies if what the railroad has done was proper and necessary for the safety of its road-bed.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, who is a married woman, joining her husband with her as a coplaintiff, brings this action against the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company to recover damages alleged to have been done to her property, as well as to her health, by reason of the obstruction, by the defendant company, of the natural flow of surface water over and across the right of way and railroad track of defendant. The allegations in the complaint, substantially, are that some time in the year 1867 the defendant company constructed its railway through the town of Graniteville, over and along Canal street of said town, running north and south, parallel with Horse creek, a natural watercourse, on the west of the railway; that plaintiff is the lessee of certain premises situate at the northeast corner of Canal street and Cottage, the latter being a street running perpendicular to the former; that on the eastern side of the town of Graniteville the land is hilly, and gradually slopes towards Horse creek; and that the surface water which would accumulate on the eastern side was accustomed to flow, in part, down and along Cottage street, across Canal street, to said Horse creek, previous to the construction of defendant's road, and for some time afterwards, without injury to plaintiff's premises, but that some time in the year 1878 "the defendant negligently, unlawfully, and unnecessarily" erected a large sand bank, at the intersection of Canal and Cottage streets, whereby the surface water was forced back on plaintiff's premises, and has continued to maintain and increase said sand bank. The defendant claims that the sand bank complained of (which was constructed on defendant's right of way) was necessary to protect its roadbed and right of way from being undermined and washed away by the flow of the surface water, and therefore its construction was no invasion of the legal rights of the plaintiff, and the defendant is not liable for any damages which plaintiff may have sustained by reason of such obstruction of the flow of the surface water. The circuit judge, in effect, charged the jury that the first question for them to determine was whether the construction of the sand bank was necessary for the protection of defendant's roadbed and right of way, and, if so, then the defendant was not liable. The jury, under this instruction, found a verdict in favor of the defendant, and, judgment being entered thereon, the plaintiff appeals upon the several grounds set out in the record. Under the view which we take we do not deem it necessary to repeat these grounds, for the whole case, in our judgment, turns upon the inquiry whether there was any error in the instruction thus given to the jury.

It is not, and cannot be, denied that the rule in regard to interference with the flow of surface water is wholly different from that which prevails in regard to the waters of a natural watercourse. We shall therefore confine our attention entirely to the rule as to surface water. What that rule is has been the subject of debate in numerous cases in the other states, many of which we have examined in preparing this opinion. Some of the states have adopted what is known as the "civil-law rule," while others seem to have adopted what is designated as the "intermediate rule," while others, again (a majority of the states, as is said in a note to Goddard v. Harpswell, 30 Am. St. Rep. 891), adhere to the rule of the common law. In this state, so far as we are informed, there is no adjudication upon the subject, for what was said upon the subject by the late Chief Justice Simpson was "not intended as a final adjudication, and conclusive of said question in the future," as he himself expressly said in that opinion, but simply his own opinion as to the comparative merits of the several rules. But in view of the express declaration of the lawmaking power, as embodied in section 2734 of the General Statutes, we feel bound to declare, in the absence of any constitutional provision, statute, or even authoritative decision to the contrary, that the common-law rule must still be recognized as controlling here, for that section expressly declares that "every part of the common-law of England, not altered by this act nor inconsistent with the constitution of this state, and the customs and laws thereof, is hereby continued in full force and virtue within this state in the same manner as before the passage of this act." Under the common-law rule, surface water is regarded as a common enemy, and every landed proprietor has a right to take any measures necessary to the protection of his own property from its ravages, even if, in doing so, he throws it back upon a coterminous proprietor, to his damage, which the law regards as a case of damnum absque injuria, and affording no cause of action. This rule was applied in a case very much like the present,—Rove v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 41 Minn. 384. Also in Cairo & V. R. Co. v. Stevens, 73 Ind. 278, 38 Am. Rep. 139; O'Connor v. Fond du Lac, A. & P. R. Co. 52 Wis. 526, 38 Am. Rep. 754; Johnson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 80 Wis. 641, 14 L. R. A. 495. See also Chadeayne v. Robinson, 55 Conn. 345, and Abbott v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 88 Mo. 271, 53 Am. Rep. 581; in which the case of Shane v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 71 Mo. 237, 36 Am. Rep. 480, relied upon by appellant, as well as the case of McCormick v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 70 Mo. 359, 35 Am. Rep. 431, are commented on and practically overruled, so far as the question now under consideration is concerned. These cases, as well as many others which might be referred to, together with those cited by respondent's counsel in his argument, abundantly show that there was no error on the part of the circuit judge in giving the instruction complained of to the jury. The case of Staton v. Norfolk & O. R. Co., recently decided by the supreme court of North Carolina, 111 N. C. 278, 17 L. R. A. 838, seems to be much relied on by the counsel for appellant. But we do not think it in point. The question there was different from that presented here, and the discussion was principally devoted to an inquiry into the rights acquired by a railroad company from the exercise of its right to condemn lands under the power of eminent domain, with which we are not concerned here. Here we freely and fully concede the doctrine laid down in that case, that a railroad company has no higher rights in reference to the treatment of surface water than an individual land proprietor; and that is as far as that case is applicable to the present. Besides, as we understand, North Carolina is one of the states which recognizes the civil-law rule in reference to surface water, and hence the decisions in that state would afford no assistance where the common-law rule prevails. So, too, the cases of Mills v. Greenville & O. R. Co. 13 S. C. 97, and Wallace v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 34 S. C. 66, and again reported in 37 S. C. 335, being cases in reference to natural watercourses, and not cases of surface water, have no application to the present case. Nor are we able to discover anything in the case of Gregory v. Layton, 36 S. C. 93, which throws any light upon our present inquiry. Under the view which we have taken, the other grounds of appeal become immaterial; for, even if the alleged errors there complained of were well founded, the result reached would not have been affected. Assuming, as we must do, that the jury found as matter of fact that the sand bank complained of was necessary for the protection of defendant's right of way and roadbed, we are unable to see how the instructions complained of could possibly have affected the result. We may add, however, that we see no error in any of the instructions complained of.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

Joseph SIMPSON, Plff. in Err.,
v.

STATE of Georgia.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. A person in a boat on the Savannah river, within thirty yards of the Georgia side, at a point where the river is at least 175 yards wide, is prima facie in the state of Georgia.

2. The offense of shooting at another is committed in this state when one in the state of South Carolina, without malice aforethought, but not in his own defense, or under other circumstances of justification, aims and fires a pistol at another who at the time is in this state, although the ball misses him, and strikes the water in this state, near the boat which he occupies.

*Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.

NOTE.—For rivers and lakes as state boundaries, see note to Buck v. Ellenboit (Iowa) 15 L. R. A. 187. 22 L. R. A.

3. The evidence warranted the verdict and there was no error in denying a new trial.

(May 20, 1868.)

ERROR to the Superior Court of Hart County to review a judgment convicting defendant of the statutory offense of shooting at another. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. A. G. McCurry, for plaintiff in error:

The defendant is indictable where the criminal act is committed.

A common-law court has jurisdiction only over transactions within its own county.

1 Bishop. New Crim. L. § 111; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. §§ 47, 49.

Subject to exceptions to be stated, no man is to suffer criminally for what he does out of the territorial limits of the county.

1 Bishop, New Crim. L. § 110, and authorities there cited.

The exception referred to is this: If one personally out of the county puts in motion a force which takes effect in it he is answerable where the evil is done though his presence is elsewhere, as where a man standing beyond the outer line of our territory by discharging a ball over the line kills another within it.

1 Bishop, New Crim. L. § 110. See the doctrine also in 1 Whart. Crim. L. § 279.

Where any felony or misdemeanor shall be begun in one county and completed in another, it may be dealt with, etc., in either county as if it were wholly committed therein.

1 Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. 217.

Venue is a fact to be proven by the state and unless proven a conviction will not stand.

Davis v. State, 82 Ga. 205.

It must be proved as laid.

State v. Hartnett, 75 Mo. 251, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 572.

In all the cases cited in the books something was done in the territory where the prosecution was had.

In the case of shooting at another the offense is complete by aiming and firing the gun or pistol irrespective of the execution that may be done and irrespective of the range and distance of the bullet. If the balls from Mr. Simpson's pistols did not take effect within Georgia's jurisdiction—if he aimed and fired in the state of South Carolina—and if the crime of shooting at another is completed by aiming and firing, then there was no criminal act and no part of the crime committed in Georgia so as to bring the case within any of the exceptions to the general rule.

Mr. William M. Howard, Sol. Gen., for the State.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. According to the convention of Beaufort between the states of Georgia and South Carolina, agreed on by the commissioners of both states on the 28th of April, 1787, the current or main thread of the channel of the Savannah river is the boundary between the two states. Code, § 16; Hotchkiss' Stat. 918-917. This being so, at a point where the river is not less than 175 yards wide, a person in a boat not more than thirty yards from the Georgia side is prima facie in this state. In the present case it was practically conceded that the testimony showed the person assaulted was on the Georgia side of the main current of the river.

2. Under the evidence introduced in behalf of the state, and which the jury evidently believed to be true, the accused shot twice at the prosecutor, intending the balls from the pistol used to take effect upon him. At the time of the firing the prosecutor was in a boat upon the Savannah river, and within the state of Georgia, and the accused was standing upon the bank of the river in the state of South Carolina. It was conceded that if either or both of the balls had struck the prosecutor an offense of some kind would have been committed in Georgia, upon the idea that the act of the accused took effect in this state; but it was contended that, inasmuch as the prosecutor was not struck, no effect whatever was produced in Georgia by the act in question. This contention is not well founded in point of fact, for the evidence shows conclusively that, although the prosecutor was not injured, the balls did strike the water of the river in close proximity to him, within this state, and therefore it is certain that they took effect in Georgia, although not the precise effect intended, assuming that the verdict correctly finds it was the deliberate purpose of the accused to actually shoot at the prosecutor. What the accused did was a criminal act, and it did take effect in this state. Mr. Bishop says: "The law deems that a crime is committed in the place where the criminal act takes effect. Hence, in many circumstances, one becomes liable to punishment in a particular jurisdiction while his personal presence is elsewhere. Even in this way he may commit an offense against a state or county upon whose soil he never set his foot." 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 58. And see Bishop, Crim. Law, § 110. Of course, the presence of the accused within this state is essential to make his act one which is done in this state, but the presence need not be actual. It may be constructive. The well-established theory of the law is that, where one puts in force an agency for the commission of crime, he, in legal contemplation, accompanies the same to the point where it becomes effectual. Thus, a burglary may be committed by inserting into a building a hook or other contrivance by means of which goods are withdrawn therefrom; and there can be no doubt that, under these circumstances, the burglar, in legal contemplation, enters the building. So, if a man in the state of South Carolina criminally fires a ball into the state of Georgia, the law regards him as accompanying the ball, and as being represented by it, up to the point where it strikes. If an unlawful shooting occurred while both the parties were in this state, the mere fact of missing would not render the person who shot any the less guilty. Consequently, if one shooting from another state goes, in a legal sense, where his bullet goes, the fact of his missing the object at which he aims cannot alter the legal principle. Cases are numerous in which it has been held that where a person wounds another in one state or country, but the person wounded dies elsewhere, beyond its territorial boundaries, the courts of the state or country in which death occurred have jurisdiction to try the offense. A leading case on this line is that of Tyler v. People, 8 Mich. 320, in which there was a dissenting opinion by Justice Campbell. The ruling of the majority of the court, however, was approved in the case of Com. v. Macloon, 101 Mass. 1. Justice Gray, who delivered the opinion in the latter case, says, on page 7, that if one's "unlawful act is the efficient cause of the mortal injury, his personal presence at the time of its beginning, its continuance, or its result, is not essential. He may be held guilty of homicide by shooting, even if he stands afar off, out of sight, or in another jurisdiction;" and the words quoted are followed by apt illustrations. On page 17 of the same report Justice Gray disapproves the dissenting opinion of Justice Campbell above mentioned. There is, however, a clear distinction between cases like the one just cited, where a wound is inflicted in one jurisdiction and death ensues in another, and cases like the present, where the accused in one state puts in operation a force which takes effect in another. On page 843 of 8 Mich., supra, this distinction is clearly stated by Justice Campbell. He says the doctrine of constructive presence is not applicable to a case like that with which he was then dealing, and then uses the following language which sustains our ruling in the case at bar. Speaking of constructive presence, he says: "All that it amounts to is that the crime shall be regarded as committed where the injurious act is done. A wounding must, of course, be done where there is a person wounded, and the criminal act is the force against his person. That is the immediate act of the assailant, whether he strikes with a sword or shoots a gun; and he may very reasonably be held present where his forcible act becomes directly operative." This doctrine is supported by Rorer, Interstate Law, 241, 243, 244, citing Johns v. State, 19 Ind. 421, 423, 81 Am. Dec. 408. And see Whart. Conf. L. § 825, and notes on pages 717, 718; Whart. Crim. L. §§ 278-280. In Adams v. People, 1 N. Y. 173, it appeared that the accused forged a paper in Ohio, upon which he procured money in New York, through an innocent agent, without going into the latter state. He afterwards voluntarily went into that state, and was indicted and tried for the crime. It was conceded by both court and counsel that he was guilty of committing the crime in the state of New York, and the question upon which the case turned was simply whether or not, inasmuch as he owed no allegiance to that state, he could be tried and punished therein. In United States v. Davis, 2 Sumn. 482, it appeared that a gun was fired from an American ship lying in the harbor of Raiatea, one of the Society isles, by which a person on a schooner belonging to the natives, and lying in the same harbor, was killed; and it was held that the act, in contemplation of law, was done on board the foreign schooner, where the shot took effect, and that jurisdiction of the crime belonged to the foreign government, and not to the courts of the United States. In Hawes on Jurisdiction of Courts (sec. 110), it is laid down that "a crime may be committed within the jurisdiction of a state, although the person committing it never was within its borders, if the act takes effect there." An interesting discussion pertinent to the question involved may be found in 6 Crim. L. Mag., beginning on page 155, in an article entitled "Dynamiting and Extraterritorial Crime." "A party who, in one jurisdiction, or in one county, may put in operation a force that does harm in another, may be liable in either for the offense." Brown, Jurisdiction of Courts, § 92. This section also contains numerous illustrations which are apt and pertinent. See also Reg. v. Rogers, 14 Cox, C. C. 22. The above authorities demonstrate beyond question that a criminal act begun in one state and completed in another renders the person who does the act liable to indictment in the latter. In view of these authorities, there cannot in the present case be any doubt whatever that Simpson would have been indictable in Georgia if a ball from his pistol had actually wounded Sadler. That this would be true is too well established for serious controversy. The able and zealous counsel for the plaintiff in error candidly conceded that such would be the law, but contended that, as the balls "took no effect in Georgia," the entire act of the accused was committed in South Carolina, and that he really did nothing in this state. We have endeavored to show that this contention is not sound. As we have already stated, the act of the accused did take effect in this state. He started across the river with his leaden messenger, and was operating it up to the moment when it ceased to move, and was, therefore, in a legal sense, after the ball crossed the state line, up to the moment that it stopped, in Georgia. It is entirely immaterial that the object for which he crossed the line failed of accomplishment. It having been established by abundant authority and precedent that in crime there may be a constructive as well as an actual presence, there can be, in a case of this kind, in which the act of the accused, when analyzed, is simply an attempt to unlawfully wound another by shooting, no rational distinction in principle, as to the question of jurisdiction, whether the attempt is successful or not. The criminality was complete, and the offense was perpetrated in Georgia, irrespective of results.

3. The evidence was conflicting. According to that introduced by the accused, and supported by his statement, he did not intend to shoot the prosecutor at all; but the evidence of the latter was amply sufficient to warrant the jury in concluding that the accused actually, deliberately, and without any legal excuse or justification whatever, undertook to shoot him. In view of this evidence, the jury might well have found the accused guilty of assault with intent to murder, and he cannot complain that they found him guilty of the lesser offense of shooting at another. There was no error in denying a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

PENNSYLVANIA R. CO., Plff. in Err.,

v.

Howard PARRY.

(.....N. J.....)

A round-trip ticket "via Burlington branch" from a point on the main line of a railroad to a point on the branch line, with a provision that it is "not good to stop off en route" is subject to a regulation of the company making it good on the main line only upon those trains which connect with the trains on the branch, and does not entitle a passenger, on reaching the junction upon his return trip, to take an accommodation on the main line which stops at his destination, but which he is enabled to catch only because it is late, and by leaving the branch train while it stands on a Y track and walking to the depot, although he might have ridden on the accommodation train without paying any more for his ticket if he had bought separate tickets for the round trip on each line, and although by taking the accommodation he could avoid waiting a half hour or more for the so-called connecting train.

(November 20, 1893.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit for Burlington County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful ejection of plaintiff from defendant's train in breach of defendant's contract of carriage. Reversed.

Statement by McGill, Ch.:

The plaintiff below, Howard Parry, on the 23d of December, 1890, purchased an excursion ticket from Riverton, where he lived, to Mt. Holly, both places being in Burlington county. Riverton is on the main line of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, between Trenton and Camden; and Mt. Holly is upon a branch line, called the Burlington Branch. The ticket purchased by Parry indicated that his route was to be "via Burlington branch," and that the ticket was "not good to stop off en route." The regulations of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company required that passengers holding such tickets, in going from Riverton to Mt. Holly and returning, should change cars at its Broad street station, in the city of Burlington, into which station both the trains of the branch, and the main lines of its railroad ran. Upon returning from Mt. Holly, in the afternoon of the day named, Parry took a train that left Mt. Holly at 4:38 o'clock, and should, according to the company's regulations, connect at the Broad street station with a train which would leave Trenton at 5:20 o'clock. That connection required passengers destined for Riverton to wait at the Broad street station a half hour, or more, for the arrival of the train from Trenton. On the day in question, the train which Parry took at Mt. Holly reached the end of the branch line at the city of Burlington, and came to a stop upon the Y track, which connected with the main line about half a mile from the Broad street station, and there waited to allow a belated train upon the main line to pass, before it, into the Broad street depot. That train was a local accommodation, scheduled to stop at Riverton, but was not one of the connecting trains with Mt. Holly. With a view to saving the half hour's delay at the Broad street station, in waiting for the proper connecting train, Parry and a friend got off the train from Mt. Holly while it stood on the Y track, and, walking the half mile to the Broad street station, reached it in time to catch the belated train, which would stop at Riverton. Upon that train, Parry presented the return half of his excursion ticket, and was informed that it was good only on trains which connected with the Burlington Branch Railroad at the Broad street station, according to the regulations of the company, and that, as the train he was on did not make such connection, the ticket was not good upon it. Parry refused to pay his fare, and was put off the train at a way station, before Riverton was reached, without unnecessary force or indignity. Upon the appearance of the above-stated facts, in the case made by the plaintiff below, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, and, upon the denial of that motion, error is, among other things, now assigned.

Mr. S. H. Grey, for plaintiff in error:

A stop-off is not a right resulting from the contract to carry, but is a matter of consent by or contract with the carrier. To break the journey is to break the contract.

State v. Overton, 24 N. J. L. 435, 61 Am. Dec. 671; Ripley v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. 31 N. J. L. 388; Petrie v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 42 N. J. L. 449; Wyman v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 34 Minn. 210; Stone v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 82, 29 Am. Rep. 458; Churchill v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 67 Ill. 390; McClure v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 34 Md. 535, 6 Am. Rep. 345; Drew v. Central Pac. R. Co. 51 Cal. 425; Dietrich v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 7 Pa. 432. 10 Am. Rep. 711; Old Creek & A. F.

NOTE.—The above case is a peculiar one in its facts, and the decision is not likely to command universal approval. The interpretation of the contract seems unusually strict in view of the fact that the right claimed by the passenger is denied merely because he took one ticket instead of two which he might have had for the same price, and also of the fact that the carrier would not seem to be in any way injured or put to a disadvantage by carrying him on the earlier train which was an ordinary accommodation train. It seems difficult to see any reason for denying the right claimed except to compel the passenger to pay twice for the same ride. These considerations make the construction of the contract as to what is a "connecting" train seem unnecessarily technical. For other cases involving questions remotely similar to the above, see Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Henry (Tex.) 16 L. R. A. 313; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Looney (Tex.) 16 L. R. A. 471, and note; Nichols v. Southern Pac. Co. (Or.) 18 L. R. A. 55, and note.

Co. v. Clark, 72 Pa. 231; Cleveland, C. & O. R. Co. v. Bartram, 11 Ohio St. 457; Hatten v. Newark & J. O. R. Co. 39 Ohio St. 375; Cheney v. Boston & M. R. Co. 11 Met. 121, 45 Am. Dec. 190.

If Parry entered the train for the purpose of testing his rights, and with a view of making a case, it has been held by respectable courts that under such circumstances there could be no recovery of damages for injury to his feelings.

Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Cole, 29 Ohio St. 126, 23 Am. Rep. 729; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Trimble, 54 Ark. 354.

Messrs. John W. Wescott and Samuel K. Robbins, for defendant in error:

The right of the plaintiff to show the construction put upon this contract by the company, as evidenced by general usage, or the custom upon the road is distinctly recognized by Chief Justice Green in his opinion in State v. Overton, 24 N. J. L. 439, 61 Am. Dec. 671.

The conduct of the parties to a contract may be shown in order to settle its true interpretation.

Burlew v. Hillman, 16 N. J. Eq. 27.

The railroad company made an unjust discrimination against the plaintiff in refusing his ticket.

Messenger v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 37 N. J. L. 531, 18 Am. Rep. 754; State v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 55, 57 Am. Rep. 543.

The contract is to be taken most strongly against the defendants, as the language is their own.

Dancey v. Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada, 19 Ont. App. Rep. 664, 52 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 181.

The railroad company, notwithstanding this provision, claimed to have required the holder of such ticket to stop off at Burlington station for nearly an hour, before forwarding him to his destination.

Was he required to remain at the station during this time to avoid a breach of the contract?

If he had walked from the Junction to Burlington station and taken the 5:20 train from Trenton, or if he had walked or ridden to Beverly and resumed his journey on the 5:20 train from Trenton, his ticket would have been good on that train.

Auerbach v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 89 N. Y. 281, 42 Am. Rep. 290; 8 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 161.

By either of these courses he would have stopped off en route longer and more effectually than he did in this instance.

It was the duty of the railroad company to forward the plaintiff to his destination promptly, and a serious delay like that involved in awaiting the arrival of the 5:20 train from Trenton warranted him in taking a different train, if by so doing he could expedite his journey.

Wilsey v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 38 Ky. 511, 26 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 258, confirmed on appeal October 24, 1889, reported in 39 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 418.

McGill, Ch., delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion to nonsuit presented to the 22 L. R. A.

court below this question: Whether the contract between Mr. Parry and the railroad company permitted Mr. Parry to quit the branch road train before it reached its destination, and, proceeding in advance of it, continue his journey in a train with which it did not connect, and was made available to him only by accidental delay. It is established by the course of judicial decision that when a person who purchases a railway ticket to a certain place takes his seat in a particular train, that goes to his destination, he cannot, without permission of the railway company, while the train is reasonably pursuing the duty of the carrier, leave it, and take another train, and complete his journey under the same contract. The reason is that his contract is entire, and neither he nor the company can be required to perform it in fragments. State v. Overton, 24 N. J. L. 435, 61 Am. Dec. 671; Petrie v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 42 N. J. L. 449; Cheney v. Boston & M. R. Co. 11 Met. 121, 45 Am. Dec. 190; Dietrich v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 71 Pa. 432, 10 Am. Rep. 711; Oil Creek & A. R. Co. v. Clark, 72 Pa. 231; Vankirk v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 76 Pa. 73, 18 Am. Rep. 404; Hamilton v. New York Cent. R. Co. 51 N. Y. 100; Wyman v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 84 Minn. 210; McClure v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 34 Md. 532, 6 Am. Rep. 345; Stone v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 82, 29 Am. Rep. 458; Churchill v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 67 Ill. 390; Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Bartram, 11 Ohio St. 457; Hatten v. Newark & J. C. R. Co. 39 Ohio St. 375; Wilsey v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 38 Ky. 511. It is not necessary that the contract of carriage should be fully set out in the passenger's ticket. The ticket is a mere token that the fare has been paid, and that the passenger has the right to be carried to the destination it indicates, according to the reasonable regulations of the railway company. Such regulations—at least, so far as they are known to the passenger—enter into the contract of passage, and it is the duty of the passenger to conform to them. The proofs of the plaintiff below very clearly exhibited that Mr. Parry was familiar with the regulations under which the defendant company was accustomed to transport passengers between Riverton and Mt. Holly upon such tickets as the one he purchased. He admits that he knew that the local accommodation train was apt to be belated, and that the train upon the branch road did not connect with it, and, hence, that the latter train would not continue to the Broad street station in Burlington until the former had passed, and that it was possible, occasionally, to catch it by quitting the branch road train while it was waiting upon the Y, and walking a half mile to the Broad street depot. Indeed, it was his accurate knowledge of the regulations of the company, and the delay they occasioned, that prompted him to disregard them, when he saw an opportunity to expedite his transit. He states that he could have purchased an excursion ticket from Riverton to Burlington and back, and another from Burlington to Mt. Holly and return, for the same price that he paid for the single excursion ticket from Riverton to Mt. Holly and return, and in that way have secured the undoubted right to return by the local accommodation, if he could have caught it. But he did not purchase the two excursion tickets, and make his contract in that way. He chose, rather, to buy the single ticket which expressly provided that he should be transported between the terminal points of his journey "via Burlington branch," and subjected him to the regulations that he should be carried to the Broad street station, and there change to the cars of a connecting train. Under authority of the rule referred to, even in absence of the express notice upon his ticket that he should not "stop off en route," after he had once started in a train, it may be questionable whether it would not have been an abandonment of his contract if he had left the train, while it was duly performing its duty, at any other point than that which the regulations designated for that purpose. The notice upon the ticket simply served to call attention to that rule. But, in deciding this case, it is not necessary to determine that question. The additional fact that, with the express notice which the ticket gave before him, he quit the branch train with the deliberate intention of not again taking either it or its connecting train, appears; and, in light of such fact, his nonconformity to the regulations which entered into his contract, and consequent infraction of that contract, and abandonment of his rights thereunder, become too conspicuous to admit of doubt. There was nothing in the evidence to indicate that the regulations of the defendant company were not reasonable, and it is admitted that the train abandoned was pursuing its way as those regulations required. Under these conditions, the conductor was justified in demanding a new fare, and, upon the refusal of Mr. Parry to pay it, to remove him from the train, in the manner that was adopted. State v. Overton, supra. It is our conclusion that the plaintiff below should have been nonsuited, and, hence, that the judgment now reviewed must be reversed.

Magie, J., dissenting:

Parry held a return ticket which expressed the contract of the railroad company to carry him from Mt. Holly to Riverton "via Burlington branch." There was no condition in the contract that he should take a continuous train, and there was no such train. Nor was there in it any condition that he should take a connecting train, and, strictly speaking, there was no connecting train with that on which he rode from Mt. Holly to Burlington. Passengers by that train were obliged to wait in Burlington for a considerable time before, in ordinary course, a train left for Riverton. The only condition of the contract affecting Parry was that forbidding him to "stop off en route." Had the train which brought Parry from Mt. Holly moved on to the station in Burlington, he would have been obliged to alight, and, in the absence of stipulations to the contrary, could take the next train on the main line to Riverton, even though that train was a belated train, not usually running at that time. But this train which brought Parry from Mt. Holly had in fact passed over the branch road, and arrived at the main line at the junction. When Parry alighted there, he, perhaps, forfeited his right to be carried to the station; but by such alighting, and walking the short distance to the station, he did not forfeit his right to be carried from there to Riverton, unless his act was a stopping off en route. Whether Parry's conduct violated the condition depended on whether he acted with intent to break the continuity of his journey. That was a question for the jury, and it was properly left to them. Finding no error, I shall vote to affirm.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

C. F. JEWETT PUBLISHING CO.

v.

Benjamin F. BUTLER.

(.....Mass.....)

1. An agreement by an author to indemnify his publisher for any costs and damages by reason of the publication is not invalid, on the ground that an unlawful publication is intended, where it does not appear that there was any intention on the part of either to write or publish anything libelous.
2. Doubts as to the solvency of a publishing corporation will not justify the breach of a contract to furnish it a book for publication.

3. The disgrace attaching to the name of a corporation on account of the conduct of its former president and manager, whose name it bears, is not sufficient ground for breaking a contract to furnish it a book for publication.

(Lathrop, J., dissents.)

(October 19, 1893.)

REPORT by the Supreme Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full court of an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract to furnish the manuscript of a certain book, written by defendant, to the plaintiff for publication. Judgment for plaintiff.

NOTE.—The illegality of a contract to indemnify a person against liability for publishing a libel can hardly be questioned, but the above case presents a contract easily subject to different interpretations as appears in the disagreeing opinions, but 22 L. R. A.

which is held to be merely an indemnity against possible liability for unintentional libel. In this respect the case is apparently novel as well as interesting.

The contract recited that defendant "is minded and intending to write and have published two volumes in the nature of autobiography or reminiscences of his life and the acts and doings of other public men so far as they may seem to him to elucidate the history of the country or public affairs," and stipulated that plaintiff should do the publishing. The contract also contained a clause relating to the publication of libels. Defendant agreed to furnish the material for the book within a limited time. Shortly after the contract was made, defendant furnished some manuscript, but before he supplied any more, C. F. Jewett, an agent of the plaintiff corporation and for whom it was named, absconded, having issued a larger sum of its capital stock than it was entitled to on his private account. Defendant thereupon placed the publication of his book in another house and plaintiff brought this action to recover the damages which it had sustained in preparing for the publication and in the loss of profits which it would have made from the sale.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. E. C. Bumpus, Samuel J. Elder, and William Cushing Wait, for plaintiff:

The contract indicates no purpose to commit an illegal act. The defendant was to assume the responsibility and pay costs and damages. The assumption of responsibility does not in any sense imply that it was his purpose to commit wrong. People do not advertise a purpose to commit libel in advance. "Ordinarily when parties enter into such a contract, it is done in such a manner as in form to conceal its illegality."

Riley v. Jordan, 122 Mass. 231; Babcock v. Terry, 97 Mass. 432.

Because the defendant proposed to write a book "without illegal intent" as the report finds, on public men, and affairs of his time, it is fair to presume that his purpose was to tell the truth and commit no libel, rather than to willfully traduce public men of his time.

Waugh v. Morris, L. R. 8 Q. B. 202-208; Harvey v. Varney, 98 Mass. 118; Guernsey v. Cook, 120 Mass. 501; Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229; Ormes v. Dauchy, 82 N. Y. 443, 37 Am. Rep. 588; Hunt v. Elliott, 80 Ind. 245, 41 Am. Rep. 494.

Doubtless if after the beginning of the publication the book had become libelous in its character the plaintiff could only have continued to publish it at his peril, after the knowledge had been brought to him. But what might have happened is of no consequence as to the condition of affairs at the time his contract was broken.

In Gale v. Leckie, 2 Stark. N. P. 107, where the author after beginning to prepare material for publication abandoned it and claimed that he was exonerated from his contract from fear of prosecution, Ellenborough, Ch. J., says, that the withdrawal of an author from his work on the plea that he may be subject to prosecution, is insufficient without proof that the work he was doing or was to do was illegal. On the contrary it is to be presumed in the absence of evidence that it was not in violation of law.

the printer ascertained that the book after the beginning of publication contained libelous matter, he was allowed to recover for his services up to the time of the libel.

This clause may have been put into the contract with an idea of protection if, perchance, in the course of writing an extensive work, anything should happen to get into the book that would subject the publishers to litigation; but such might well have been put in any contract relating to any book that has ever been published. Would that fact have the slightest effect upon any contract unless it should appear, in conjunction with it, that there was a wicked purpose to libel, or that the character of the book to be published would of necessity create a libel? Again, such a contract as that could not have been enforced in the event of the plaintiff's having published the book and been mulcted for libel.

Arnold v. Clifford, 2 Sumn. 238; Shackell v. Rosier, 2 Bing. N. C. 634. See also Babcock v. Terry, supra.

The defendant's doubts of the solvency of the plaintiff did not authorize him to terminate the contract.

Messrs. John Lowell and E. M. Johnson for defendant.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question is whether the contract is, as the defendant contends, illegal on its face. The words relied on to show that it is are as follows: "The party of the first part agrees to accept full responsibility of all matter contained in said work, and to defend at his own cost any suits which may be brought against the party of the second part for publishing any statements contained in said work, and to pay all costs and damages arising from said suit." The presiding justice found that "the contract was made without illegal intent, unless and except so far as the words used import one as matter of law." Do the words used, as quoted above, import one as matter of law? We think not. The parties were contracting respecting a book which was not in existence, but was to be written. There was nothing in the character of the proposed work which naturally or necessarily involved the publication of scandalous or libelous matter, as was the case, for instance, in Shackell v. Rosier, 2 Bing. N. C. 634, referred to by the defendant. At the same time it was not impossible that, in spite of due care and good faith on the part of the author and publisher, the proposed book might contain matter which others perhaps would deem libelous. In such a case it would be no more unlawful for the parties to provide that the author should save the publisher harmless from all costs and damages to which he might be subjected by reason of the publication of the book than it would be for a patentee to agree with his licensee that he would protect him against all costs and damages to which he might be subjected in consequence of using the patent to which the license applied. The case stands on grounds entirely different from those on which it would stand if it appeared that the parties intended to publish or contemplated the publication of libelous matter. There is nothing in the agreement fairly to show that such was their purpose. The most that can be said is that, though there was no intention to write or publish, nor any contemplation of writing or publishing, libelous matter on the part of the author or publisher, it might turn out, after the book was published, that it did contain libelous matter. But that is very far from saying that the parties had in view an illegal purpose in publishing the book. We see nothing unlawful in a contract which provides, without anything more, that the author shall indemnify the publisher for costs and damages to which he may be subjected by reason of the publication of a book to be written by the author. Moreover, it was possible in this case that the book might not contain libelous matter, although libel suits against the publisher might grow out of it. It would be hard to say, in such event, that the publisher, who might have published the book without any libelous purpose, and in the full belief that it contained nothing libelous, could not recover of the author under this clause in the contract the costs and damages to which he had been put by such suits. In order, we think, to render the contract unlawful, it should appear that there was an intention on the part of the author and publisher to write and publish libelous matter, or that the author proposed, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the publisher, to write libelous matter, or that the contract on its face provided for or promoted an illegal act. We do not think the clause in question is fairly susceptible of either construction. Fletcher v. Harcot, Hutton, 55; Battersey's Case, Winch, K. B. 49; Betts v. Gibbins, 2 Ad. & El. 57; Adamson v. Jarvis, 4 Bing. 66; Waugh v. Morris, L. R. 8 Q. B. 202; Pearce v. Brooks, L. R. 1 Exch. 213; Cannan v. Bryce, 3 Barn. & Ald. 179; Graves v. Johnson, 156 Mass. 211, 15 L. R. A. 834.

The defendant contends, in the next place, that he was justified in his refusal to go on with the contract because of his doubts as to the solvency of the plaintiff corporation, and because of the disgrace attaching to its name in consequence of the conduct of Jewett. The first ground thus taken would seem to be disposed of by the recent case of Hobbs v. Columbia Falls Brick Co., 157 Mass. 109, and need not, therefore, be further considered. As to the second ground, it is to be observed that the contract was not made with Jewett personally, but with the corporation which bore his name. Moreover, Jewett has died, and it fairly may be presumed that his place as president and manager has been filled by the election of another person, so that the defendant cannot and will not be obliged to come into further association with him. It is well known that corporations are frequently organized which bear as part of their corporate name the name of some individual.

The contention of the defendant would require us to hold that in all such cases a party making a contract with such a corporation would be justified in refusing to go on with it if the person whose name the corporation bore committed an act rendering him liable to punishment as a criminal, or bringing him into disgrace and rendering further association with him unprofitable and injurious to the other party to the contract. But a corporation does not in such a case impliedly guarantee as an element of the contract entered into with it that the person whose name it bears shall continue to be a reputable member of society. The corporation is distinct from the person whose name it bears. Its interests and those of its stockholders in contracts made by it with other parties are not to be affected by the disgraceful or criminal conduct of the person whose name it bears, and for which it is in no way responsible.

A majority of the court think the entry should be, judgment for plaintiff for $2,500 and interest from June 9, 1890, and it is so ordered.

Lathrop, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the opinion of the majority of the court that the contract sought to be enforced is a valid contract. The contract provides for the publication of a work to contain the author's autobiography "or reminiscences of his life, and the acts and doings of other public men, so far as they may seem to him to elucidate the history of the country or public affairs." It is in reference to a work of this character that the defendant agrees to do three things: First, "to accept full responsibility of all matters contained in said work;" secondly, "to defend at his own cost any suits which may be brought against the party of the second part for publishing any statements contained in said work;" thirdly, "to pay all costs and damages arising from such suits." The obligation of the defendant is not limited to paying legal expenses, but includes costs and damages recovered against the publisher "for publishing any statements contained in said work." While it is found that the parties acted without illegal intent, yet if the legal effect of the language used is to make the contract against the policy of the law, this court ought not to enforce it. It seems to me to be impossible to say that the language used applies only to groundless suits, and that it should be so construed. What the parties contemplated, and what they intended to provide for, was that actions might be brought against the publisher for libelous matter contained in the work; that these actions might be successfully maintained against the publisher, who would then be compelled to pay damages and costs. In this event the writer agreed to indemnify the publisher. Could such an agreement have been enforced? In my opinion, it could not, and this view is sustained by the authorities. Shackell v. Rosier, 2 Bing. N. C. 634; Colburn v. Patmore, 1 Cromp. M. & R. 73; Gale v. Leckie, 2 Stark. N. P. 107; Clay v. Yates, 1 Hurlst. & N. 73; Arnold v. Clifford, 2 Sumn. 238; Odgers, Slander & Libel, 2d ed.

8. See also Bradlaugh v. Newdegate, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 1, 12; Babcock v. Terry, 97 Mass. 482.

It follows that the whole contract was tainted with illegality, and neither party was bound to go on with it. Robinson v.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Charles K. BREEZE et al., Appts.,

v.

John BROOKS et al., Resp'ts.

(.....Cal.....)

1. Permitting the record title of land to remain in another will not make a subsequent conveyance to the real owner fraudulent as to the creditors of the former where they gave the debtor credit merely on his own representations of ownership and his possession and did not rely on the records or any act of the owner.

2. The findings of the trial court should receive such construction as will uphold rather than defeat its judgment thereon.

(December 24, 1893.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Mateo County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce a judgment recovered against John Brooks upon lands belonging to his brother Patrick Brooks, which at the time the debt was contracted were standing in the name of John upon the public records. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. S. F. Lieb, with Messrs. George W. Fox and George C. Ross, for appellants. Messrs. E. B. Mastick and W. C. Belcher for respondents.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs brought this action to subject certain lands of Patrick Brooks, which he had allowed to stand of record in the name of his brother John, to their claim as creditors of John, upon the ground that the subsequent transfer from John to Patrick was fraudulent, and with intent to defraud them as creditors. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs have appealed upon the judgment roll alone, claiming that, upon the findings of fact

NOTE.—Estoppel of landowner by allowing record title to remain in another.

The cases are not numerous in which the question of estoppel has turned simply on the fact that the record title was in one person while the beneficial title was in another.

Sale by record owner.

There seems to be no question but that if the one having the record title sells the land to a stranger who pays the purchase money to him without notice of the claim of the true owner the purchaser will acquire a good title.

The purchaser for a valuable consideration from a patentee in possession, and whose patent is recorded in the proper register's office takes free of all equitable claims as against patentee's title of which he had no actual notice, although documentary evidence of a mistake in the issue of the patent existed in the files and records of the general land office. Schnee v. Schnee, 23 Wis. 377, 99 Am. Dec. 183.

If a person holding the legal title permits the record title to remain in another, who sells the property to a third person who makes valuable improvements on it, the real owner will not be permitted to set up his claim. Eldridge v. Walker, 80 Ill. 27.

If the owner of land executes a deed with a blank space for the grantee's name and places it in the hands of an agent for the purpose of having the property sold, and the agent fills the blank with his own name and subsequently conveys the property to a third person ignorant of the facts in the case, the true owner will be estopped from claiming the title as against him. Pence v. Arbuckle, 22 Minn. 417.

There are also a few cases in which there were elements of estoppel in addition to the mere fact of record title in the one who sells the property. The 23 L. R. A.

decisions in these cases are analogous to those which had been made prior to the passage of the recording acts.

Before the passage of the recording acts, a grantee who concealed his deed from the world and left the grantor in possession, permitting him to deal with the property as his own, would not be permitted to assert title as against subsequent grantees, especially if he has also permitted the subsequent grantees to expend money on the faith of their title. Wendell v. Van Besselaer, 1 Johns. Ch. 344, 1 L. ed. 166.

So where, after a new settlement of an estate in favor of the settlor for life and after his death to his sons in tail male, the settlor makes a lease for a term of years to one ignorant of the true state of the title, one of the sons, who, knowing of the lease, fails to caution the lessee but permits him to go on and make repairs and improvements on the faith of the lease, will not be permitted to assert his title, after the death of his father, until the expiration of the lease. Hanning v. Ferrers, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 367.

And where a tenant in tail with remainder to another, not knowing of the entail, makes a settlement which is engrossed by the remainderman, who does not disclose his rights until after the death of the first taker, the remainderman will not be permitted, as against the claimants under the settlement, to set up his rights under the entail. Mowrey v. Walsh, 8 Cow. 238.

And where a woman, being the absolute owner of a term, is present at a treaty for her son's marriage and hears him declare that the term is to come to him on his mother's death, and signs the deed as a witness, whereby the reversion of the term is settled on the issue of the marriage after the mother's death, she will be compelled to make the settlement good. Hunsden v. Cheyney, 2 Vern. 150.

judgment should have been given in their favor. Upon a former appeal herein (71 Cal. 169), the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs was reversed upon the ground that the findings did not sustain it, and the action was remanded for a new trial. Unless, therefore, the facts now presented are materially different from those presented upon the former appeal, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

The findings of fact which were before the court on the former appeal are substantially set forth in the report of the case, and were again made by the court upon the subsequent trial, and in the same language as before. In addition thereto the court has now found that, during the time that the legal title to the land stood in John, he was generally reputed and believed in his neighborhood, and among his neighbors, and by the community generally, to be the legal and equitable owner of the land; that the deed to him was delivered to him in person by the grantors, and was taken by him to the recorder's office for record, and was recorded at his request; that, during the time that it stood of record in his name, it was assessed to him and in his name, and that he had paid certain taxes thereon; that in the year 1869 he commenced an action against the Spring Valley Water-works for damages, which, after having been partly tried, was compromised between the parties without going to judgment, under which the defendant paid him certain moneys; that at the trial thereof Patrick testified as a witness in his favor, and it was stipulated by counsel for the respective parties in open court, and in the presence of Patrick, that John was the owner in fee of the land. The court also finds certain details of the transactions between John and the plaintiffs, by which he incurred the indebtedness for which he gave them the promissory note on which they recover the judgment they are now seeking to enforce, and that during all this time the only information which Patrick had that John was obtaining credit from the plaintiffs, or dealing with them, was that he was informed of an error which the plaintiffs made in September, 1872, by charging two items, amounting to about $20, to John, instead of to himself, and of the subsequent correction of the error by transferring the items to his own account.

A comparison of the facts found at the last trial with those before the court on the former appeal shows that they do not take the case out of the principles then laid down, or call for the application of any different principles. It was then held necessary that the plaintiffs, in order to entitle them to a recovery, should show that Patrick was in some way privy to John's obtaining credit from them, or that in giving such credit they relied upon some affirmative statement or act of Patrick, other than his permitting the title to stand of record in John's name; and that the mere fact that Patrick allowed the title to the land to stand of record in the name of John was unavailing to the plaintiffs, unless they could establish, to the satisfaction of the court, that they relied there-

So if a person having title to real estate acquiesces in a sale of it by a person pretending to have title and having color of title, he will be bound by the sale, provided no fraud was practiced upon him. Funk v. Newcomer, 10 Md. 301.

Especially if he advises and encourages the sale. Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166, 2 L. ed. 88, 10 Am. Dec. 316.

If one having the legal title permits the land to be sold by one having color of title, being fully aware of his rights and intentionally or by gross negligence encouraging or influencing the purchase, he will not be permitted to subsequently assert his rights. Morris v. Moore, 11 Humph. 438.

Following the principle of those cases it has been held that—

If the grantee of land permits the record title to stand in the grantor and subsequently prevails upon a third person to purchase the land from the grantor, assuring him that the grantor has the legal title, he will be estopped from subsequently asserting his rights. Money v. Ricketts, 62 Miss. 208.

So one who, holding a bond for title to real estate, permits the former owner to sell it as his own, will be estopped from subsequently compelling a conveyance to himself from the purchaser,—especially if he received a part of the purchase price. Breeding v. Stamper, 18 B. Mon. 175.

If a person has consented that the legal title to lands shall, by absolute conveyance, be passed over to another, or discovers that another has fraudulently obtained the legal title and put it on the market, he cannot stand by and see third parties acquire rights upon such apparent title and afterward ask for relief. Ford v. Loomis, 33 Mich. 121.

If a person holding an unrecorded deed to land is present when his grantor sells the same land to a third person and assists in the sale, witnessing the 22 L. R. A.

deed, he will be estopped from subsequently setting up his own title. Sherrill v. Sherrill, 73 N. C. 8.

A son to whom a father deeds his property, but who neglects to put the deed on record, and who is subsequently present when the father settles the same property among all his children, without disclosing his own claim, will not, after the death of the father, be permitted to take the property from the other children. Sasser v. Jones, 38 N. C. 19.

In Osborn v. Elder, 65 Ga. 360, without discussing the question of the condition of the record title, it is decided that if one having the legal title to land is present at a sheriff's sale of it under a levy against a third person and does not disclose his title or forbid the sale, he will be estopped from afterwards claiming it.

If one having an unregistered deed to land stands by and sees it sold at auction as the land of the grantor, and permits a third person to buy it and pay the purchase money under the impression that he is getting a good title, he will not subsequently be permitted to dispute it. Saunderson v. Balance, 55 N. C. 322, 67 Am. Dec. 218.

If the owner of the land, whose deed is not recorded, attends and bids at a sheriff's sale of the land as the property of the former owner, he will be estopped from asserting his title as against the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. Rice v. Bunce, 49 Mo. 231, 8 Am. Rep. 129.

And the same is true if he stands by and encourages another in ignorance of such title to contract for the purchase of the land with one having the legal title. Guffey v. O'Beiley, 38 Mo. 413, 57 Am. Rep. 424.

So the vendor who has permitted the record title to be in his vendee, and who encourages a third person to loan money on the faith of such title, on as an inducement to give credit to John. The court says in its opinion: "The findings negative the idea that the plaintiffs, in giving credit to John, relied on any statement of Patrick that John owned the land; nor is it intimated that they examined the records of deeds, or that of the partition suit, to find out what they disclosed in reference to John's title or relied on them in any way to induce the credit which they extend to John. They seem to have relied on the facts that John lived on the land, claimed it in his conversations with them as his, and that he was insolvent, and Patrick knew it; and that is all which it is there claimed even tends to show Patrick as having been privy in any way to John's obtaining credit from the plaintiffs. . . . So far as the findings disclose Patrick did no act to induce creditors of John to believe the land was John's save that he allowed the title, upon the record, to stand in John's name, which record these creditors never examined. It does not appear that Patrick had any knowledge that John was getting credit from any one upon the faith of his apparent ownership of the land. There was, therefore, on the part of the former, no such carelessness or negligence as amounted to even the smallest degree of turpitude; and in such a case we understand the authorities all to agree that one cannot be estopped to set up that which, but for such act, would be a good legal title to land." Instead of there being affirmative findings in their favor, as in the opinion upon the former appeal was held to be essential to a recovery by them, the findings now presented fail to show that the plaintiffs had any knowledge of the relation held by John to the land, or of his acts in reference thereto. It is not found that they knew that he was generally reputed or believed to cannot set up his vendor's lien as against the mortgage. Alexander v. Ellison, 79 Ky. 148.

Giving credit to one having record title.

In Ludwig v. Highley, 5 Pa. 132, in which the legal title was in one in trust for another, and the creditors of the one having the legal title insisted that the true owner was estopped from asserting his claims to the property on the ground that he had permitted the other to hold himself out as the ostensible owner of the premises and thereby acquire a false credit, the court held that the rule which estops a party permitting the apparent ownership of property to remain in another from setting up title against those who have given a personal credit on the faith of it, is confined to chattels, and, in the absence of actual fraud, does not apply to realty.

The question has arisen most frequently in cases where a married woman has permitted the title to her property to stand on the record in her husband's name.

A wife who has permitted the title to her lands to stand in the name of her husband is not estopped to claim it as against a creditor of the husband, who did not extend the credit on the faith of the land. DeVore v. Jones, 82 Iowa, 66.

A wife who permits her husband to manage her property is not estopped to assert title to it before he becomes insolvent, from the fact that credit has been given him because of the title being recorded in his name, if there was no fraud or misrepresentation and she was not aware that the credit had been given on the faith of the property. Marston v. Dresen (Wis.) June 21, 1893.

But a wife who permits the title to her land to remain in her husband "because of business conveniences and considerations" will not be permitted to assert title as against one who has given the husband credit on the faith of such title and representations that the husband owned the lot. Hopkins v. Joyce, 78 Wis. 443.

And if a married woman who, together with her husband, is in possession of real estate, neglects to record her deed until after her husband has contracted for improvements thereon, she, by permitting him to hold himself out as the owner, is estopped from repudiating the contract so as to defeat a mechanics' lien. Anderson v. Armstead, 69 Ill. 452.

Judgment or attachment against one having legal title.

A recovery in tort against the owner in whose name the legal title stands will not prevent a subsequent transfer of the property to the true owner. Lillis v. Gallagher, 39 N. J. Eq. 93.

The holder of an unrecorded deed will be postponed to an attaching creditor without notice of the deed. First Nat. Bank of Denver v. Campbell, 2 Colo. App. 271.

Under the Colorado statutes, the holder of an unrecorded deed is postponed to a purchaser at a subsequent sheriff's sale under a judgment against the grantor. McMurtree v. Riddell, 9 Colo. 497.

Notice to one dealing with the land.

That the title of the true owner is not on record is immaterial, if the person dealing with the property has notice of it. Copeland v. Copeland, 23 Me. 525.

The mere fact that the wife has permitted the title to her property to stand in the name of her husband for two years will not estop her from asserting her claim to the proceeds of its sale as against the claim of one who purchased knowing of her claim to damages for the husband's deceit in making the sale. Brown v. Wright (Ark.) 21 L. R. A. 467.

If land is conveyed to a trustee to secure the payment of a debt and subsequently a third person assumes the debt and takes a conveyance from the debtor of his equity of redemption which he sells to one who immediately takes possession, and subsequently the trustee, having the legal title, sells the property at auction to one who is notified of the true state of the case, the owner in possession will not be estopped from asserting his rights by the fact that the legal title was in the trustee. Mayo v. Leggett, 96 N. C. 237.

If the true owner is in possession of the land, the fact that a mortgage is given by the one in whose name the legal title stands and that the true owner did not notify the mortgagee of his claim, will not defeat his rights as against the mortgagee. Jowers v. Phelps, 33 Ark. 465.

But if the owner in possession is asked in regard to his rights and fails to disclose them, thereby permitting a purchase to be made from the one holding the legal title, he will not be permitted to assert his rights. Yates v. Hurd, 8 Colo. 343.

So the fact that the real owner is in possession of the property and that the one in whose name the title stands gives a mortgage on the property without authority will not defeat the title of the mortgagee, if the real owner, by silence when learning of the mortgage, misled the mortgagee to his injury. Lathrop v. Groton Sav. Bank, 31 N. J. Eq. 273.

H. F. F.

be the owner, or had any information of the litigation between him and the Spring Valley Waterworks, Jr of what was done by him or by Patrick during that litigation; and it cannot, therefore, be said that it appeared to the trial court that they in any way relied thereon in giving credit to John. On the contrary, the court finds that the plaintiffs believed the statements of John, that he was the owner of the land, and knew that he was in exclusive possession of the property, "and relied on said statements, and were wholly ignorant of the fact that he (John) was not the equitable owner thereof, or that said Patrick had or claimed to have any interest therein, and solely by reason of said statements, apparent ownership, and belief, gave said John said credit, and would not have given him credit except for said statement, belief, and apparent ownership." Neither do the facts found by the court show that Patrick had any knowledge that John was obtaining credit with the plaintiffs upon the faith of his apparent ownership of the land. The court does not find that he had any such knowledge, and its finding that he knew of the charge to him of certain items which should have been charged to himself, and the subsequent correction of the mistake, cannot be construed as equivalent to a knowledge that they were charged to John upon any faith in his ownership of the land. We are not at liberty to assume, as is urged on behalf of appellants, that because of the relation between Patrick and John, and of the knowledge which Patrick had of John's relation to the land, and his knowledge that he was dealing with the plaintiffs, he must have known that they gave him this credit upon their faith in his apparent ownership of the land. The findings of the trial court are to receive such a construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, its judgment thereon; and whenever, from the facts found by it, other facts may be inferred, which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court, and upon an appeal from that judgment this court will not draw from those facts any inference of fact contrary to that which may have been drawn by the trial court for the purpose of rendering such judgment. The trial court, in this case, had before it the opinion of this court on the former appeal, and must be deemed to have made its findings of fact from the evidence before it, in the light of what was then held to be essential to a recovery by the plaintiffs. Its failure to find from the evidence the facts then declared essential to a recovery, as well as its own construction of the findings, which it has made by rendering a judgment thereon in favor of the defendants, must be regarded as its own conclusion that the evidence was insufficient to justify such findings as, under the former opinion of this court, would authorize a decision in favor of the plaintiffs.

The judgment is affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

LOUISVILLE, NEW ORLEANS &
TEXAS R. CO., Appt.,

J. F. PATTERSON.

(89 Miss. 421.)

A railroad passenger holding a first-class ticket may recover damages from the company if his request to the conductor for a seat in a first-class coach is met by an explosion of profane and contemptuous wrath and he is compelled to stand, although passengers in the car are occupying more seats than they are entitled to.

(October Term, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Claiborne County

NOTE.—Right of passenger to a seat.

The right of a passenger to a seat is generally recognized.

The contract of carriage requires the furnishing of a seat in the usual mode of conveyance, and a carrier cannot require the surrender of a ticket upon proffer of transportation alone, but it must in addition proffer a seat. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Leigh, 45 Ark. 393, 55 Am. Rep. 558.

In Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Reed, 75 Ill. 125, 20 Am. Rep. 232, the court impliedly recognized the right of a passenger to a seat by stating that it is well-recognized law that carriers of passengers may lawfully require those seeking to be carried to purchase tickets when convenient facilities to that end are afforded by the carrier to exhibit them to persons designated by the carrier for that purpose, and surrender them after securing their seats in the car or vehicle used for transportation when required by the person in immediate charge of the transportation.

And in Hardenbergh v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co., 89 Minn. 3, the court states that it is too well established to need citation of authorities that a railroad company must provide those whom it carries with the usual, reasonable accommodation for comfort in traveling, including seats.

A statute requiring a railroad company to furnish passengers with proper accommodations includes seats, and a failure to provide seats will prevent the company from taking advantage of a rule prohibiting passengers from standing on the platform. Willis v. Long Island R. Co. 22 Barb. 399.

But in Camden & A. R. Co. v. Hoosey, 99 Pa. 422, 44 Am. Rep. 120, it was held to be such contributory negligence to stand on the platform of a car as to preclude a recovery for injuries received in being thrown therefrom, although there was not sufficient room inside to obtain a seat.

A passenger who, upon entering the train finds persons standing in the aisles may take a seat in a drawing-room car without liability to ejectment by the persons in charge of it; and before doing so he is not compelled to ask the conductor for a seat, although some of the seats in the ordinary coach are occupied by baggage, if it is not plainly apparent that the seats so occupied were more than sufficient for the persons standing. Thorpe v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 78 N. Y. 404, 33 Am. Rep. 323.

in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged breach of defendant's contract to provide plaintiff with a seat in its car, and to treat him respectfully. Affirmed.

Plaintiff, a white man, purchased a first-class ticket between two points on defendant's road. He went into a coach provided for white passengers having first-class tickets. He found the seats occupied with baggage and passengers, some of whom were asleep and occupying more room than they were entitled to. The conductor informed him that he could not get a seat in that car. He went into another car provided for colored passengers, in which the conductor refused to permit him to remain. He then went into the smoker, but being uncomfortable went back to the first-class coach and insisted that the conductor should procure for him a seat. The conductor replied in an angry tone and with profanity, that he could get no seat there. Plaintiff left the train at the first stopping place and brought this suit for damages. He recovered in the justice's court. Defendant appealed to the circuit, where plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment for $75, whereupon defendant again appealed.

Messrs. Mayes & Harris for appellant.

Mr. T. Dabney Marshall, with Mr. C. A. French, for appellee:

Passengers are entitled to equal accommodations who hold the same class of tickets.

See Acts 1883, § 3, p. 46.

A carrier is bound to use the utmost care in providing safe and sufficient vehicles and means of transportation of passengers, and in their management.

Lawson, Car. p. 16, § 15.

Every person who has been injured by the negligent performance of the work of carrying is entitled to an action against the carrier.

Addison, Torts, § 1288, p. 1008.

Riding on a car platform against the rule of the company, and without reasonable excuse, has been held negligence per se. But not where

The rule setting apart a particular car for ladies and their escorts cannot be enforced against persons who are not provided with seats in other cars but, in such cases in the selection of the persons to go into the ladies' car, the object of the regulations may be regarded and observed, and the officials may select those to be admitted into that car. Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 495.

And that decision was recognized in Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 39 Wis. 633, 42 Wis. 654, 24 Am. Rep. 437.

It seems that in some instances the tickets themselves call for seats, as in Dietrich v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 71 Pa. 422, 10 Am. Rep. 711, where it is stated that a ticket reading "good for one seat" meant a seat on the train which the passenger first entered to be carried.

A distinction seems to be made between long-distance carriers and those where only short trips are to be made, under circumstances where some of the passengers may prefer to stand.

Thus in a case where a woman sixty-seven years old was compelled to stand in a ferry boat crossing between Camden and Philadelphia and was thrown down and injured by reason of the boat striking an obstacle, an effort was made to hold the ferry boat responsible for failure to provide her a seat, and the court stated that it did not appear that a less number of seats was provided than was customary and sufficient for those who ordinarily preferred to be seated while crossing that ferry, and that no circumstances were disclosed that would have justified a finding that a proper degree of care required the company to provide seats sufficient for the accommodation of all the passengers that its boat could safely carry, or of such number of passengers as ordinarily traveled in it. Burton v. West Jersey Ferry Co. 114 U. S. 474, 29 L. ed. 215.

The duty to provide for the comfort of passengers is so strongly recognized that in Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Hinds, 53 Pa. 512, 91 Am. Dec. 224, it is stated that to allow undue numbers to enter a car is a great wrong.

While in Gordon v. Manchester & L. R. Co., 52 N. H. 602, 13 Am. Rep. 97, it appeared that a train ran past a station without making the scheduled stop, in a suit by a passenger, holding a ticket, for damages, the court excused the company upon the ground that there had been such a large number of persons to take passage on the train at prior stations that they, together with those waiting at the station where plaintiff wished to take passage, would have dangerously overloaded the train.

It is not the duty of the passenger to furnish a seat for himself, but the duty devolves upon the carrier. Willis v. Long Island R. Co. 84 N. Y. 670.

And attempting to pass from one car into another while the train is in motion under the instructions of the conductor, who is attempting to provide a seat, will not prevent a passenger from recovering damages for injuries received by being jostled by a brakeman on the platform. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kelly, 32 Ind. 371, 47 Am. Rep. 149. And a similar decision was made in McIntyre v. New York Cent. R. Co. 37 N. Y. 234.

But a passenger who goes from one car to another of a moving train to find a seat does not, while upon the platform, take the risk of collision with another train. Dewire v. Boston & M. R. Co. 2 L. R. A. 166, 148 Mass. 342.

Rights of passenger when seat is refused.

A person cannot demand free transportation because he is compelled to stand, but if he boards the train knowing that it is overcrowded, he may be compelled to pay his fare or to leave. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Benson, 35 Tenn. 627.

A person who, on failure to obtain a seat, refuses to pay fare and is told to leave the train at the next stopping place but who there secures a seat cannot, while recognizing the original contract of transportation, refuse fare for the distance he was compelled to ride without a seat, although it may be possible for him to abandon that contract and rely on a contract of carriage from the point where the seat was secured. Davis v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 53 Mo. 317, 14 Am. Rep. 457.

A passenger who, upon finding the seats all occupied, refuses to surrender his ticket or pay fare without being furnished a seat and abuses the conductor in a violent manner and with profane language may lawfully be ejected from the car. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Van Houten, 43 Ind. 90.

A passenger to whom a carrier refused to furnish a seat may leave the train and sue for breach of the carriage contract, but he cannot insist on remaining in the train without delivery of his ticket, and if he attempts to do so the company may lawfully eject him therefrom. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Leigh, 45 Ark. 338, 55 Am. Rep. 558.

But refusal to pay fare until a seat is provided does not entitle the company to treat the one making such refusal as a trespasser who can be ejected from the train at any place, but a reasonable opportunity must be given him to leave in a suitable and reasonable place. Hardenbergh v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 39 Minn. 3. H. F. F.

the car is so crowded and there is not room to be had within.

Whittaker's Smith, Neg. p. 42; Wills v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 129 Mass. 351.

Appellee was not guilty of negligence in this instance, for the conductor would not provide him with a seat in the first class car.

A failure to perform a statutory duty is negligence per se.

Whittaker's Smith, Neg. p. 44.

A carrier of passengers must provide cars or vehicles sufficient as to strength and other requisites for their safe conveyance, and he is liable for the slightest negligence or fault in that regard.

Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 26 L. ed. 141.

A passenger in a railway train is entitled to the ordinary comforts of a seat therein, and is not bound to pay fare, or surrender his ticket, if he has one, until a seat be furnished to him.

2 Rorer, Railroads, p. 968; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Able, 59 Ill. 181; Davis v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 53 Mo. 817, 14 Am. Rep. 457; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Benson, 85 Tenn. 627.

If he would claim damages for not being carried according to contract, which is implied by the ticket, he should leave the train at the first suitable opportunity.

Davis v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. supra; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Leigh, 45 Ark. 363, 55 Am. Rep. 558; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Benson, supra; Barden v. Boston, O. & F. R. Co. 121 Mass. 428; Bishop, Noncont. L. § 1091.

This is just what appellee did.

A railroad company is bound to furnish its passengers reasonable and proper accommodations for traveling, and if it has an insufficient number of cars so that passengers are compelled to ride on the platform it is liable for injuries received by them while riding there.

Field, Priv. Corp. § 544; Wills v. Long Island R. Co. 34 N. Y. 670.

The carrier must provide every passenger with a seat.

Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1890; Base v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 86 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 495, 39 Wis. 686, 42 Wis. 654, 24 Am. Rep. 487; Wills v. Long Island R. Co. 33 Barb. 899, 34 N. Y. 670; Hardenbergh v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 89 Minn. 8.

The passenger is not bound to find himself a seat. This is the carrier's duty. He has no right to have him stand in the aisle of the car.

Wills v. Long Island R. Co. supra; Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1890.

If he rides on a train, and refuses to pay his fare or surrender his ticket, for want of a seat, and is ejected, he may not recover for the ejection but only for the breach of contract to furnish a seat.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Leigh, 45 Ark. 368, 55 Am. Rep. 558; Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1890.

Appellee had no right whatever to remove valises in order to provide himself with a seat.

Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1890; Thorpe v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 76 N. Y. 402, 32 Am. Rep. 325.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee paid for a seat in a first-class coach, and was entitled, as matter of right, to have the servants of the railway company who were in charge of the train furnish him such seat, unless a sudden and unusual influx of passengers rendered this impracticable. It is perfectly clear from all the evidence in this case that the conductor in charge of the train could and should have made provision for seating the appellee. It is equally certain that a proper application of the appellee to that effect provoked not only a refusal from the conductor, but subjected the audacious passenger to an explosion of profane and contemptuous wrath from that official. That a jury awarded the trivial sum complained of is proof positive that no undue prejudice existed against the corporation. Let the company thank God, and take courage.

Affirmed.

DELAWARE, LACKAWANNA & WESTERN R. CO. et al.

(.....N. J.)

*1. One injured by a collision between a locomotive of a railroad company and a car (in which he was a passenger) of a street-railway company may maintain a joint action against both companies if the collision was produced by the neglect of the railroad company to give notice of the approach of the locomotive, concurring with the neglect of the railway company to observe proper care in crossing the railroad track.

2. Although such duties are diverse,

NOTE.—The opinion in the above case, although brief, very clearly presents the law on the question of joint liability for injuries received in a railroad collision.

and the neglect to perform each is separate and disconnected, yet, as the wrongdoing of one company unites with that of the other in causing injury, the tort is joint, and one or both tortfeasors may be sued.

3. If the jury negative the negligence charged against one of such tortfeasors, a verdict against the other is not objectionable.

(November 10, 1893.)

CASE CERTIFIED by the Circuit Court for Essex County for the advisory opinion of the Supreme Court after the granting of orders, upon plaintiff to show cause why a verdict against the defendant railroad company should not be set aside and a new trial granted, and upon defendant the Newark Passenger Railway Company to show cause why a verdict in its favor should not be set aside and a new trial granted, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the joint negligence of the two defendants. Discharge of both rules advised.

Statement by Magie, J.:

Matthews, the plaintiff, brought an action of tort in the Essex circuit against the defendants to recover damages for an injury received in a collision between a locomotive of the railroad company and a car (in which he was a passenger) of the railway company. There was a verdict in favor of the railway company and against the railroad company. The railroad company obtained a rule to show cause why the verdict against it should not be set aside. Plaintiff obtained a rule to show cause why the verdict in favor of the railway company should not be set aside. The rules were consolidated and certified to this court for its advisory opinion.

Mr. R. Wayne Parker for plaintiff.

Mr. Flavel McGee for defendant Delaware, L. & W. R. Co.

Mr. Samuel Kalisch for defendant Newark Pass. Ry. Co.

Magie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel for the railroad company first urges that the verdict finding it to have been negligent was not supported by evidence, or was contrary to the weight of evidence. It is unnecessary to review in detail the case. The discussion of counsel was thorough and exhaustive, and much consideration has been given to the evidence. The conclusion reached is that there was evidence of the neglect of the railroad company to give due notice of the approach of its train sufficient to go to the jury, and, although there was much opposing evidence, it did not so preponderate as to require or justify a new trial on this ground.

It is next claimed that the verdict awarded excessive damages. The amount awarded was large, but, considering the proofs of injury, it was not so large as to indicate mistake or misconduct on the part of the jury. The verdict ought not to be disturbed on that ground.

It is lastly contended in behalf of the railroad company that the verdict against it should be set aside, because there was no proof of joint negligence on the part of the two defendants. The claim is, as I understand from the argument, that these defendants cannot be jointly sued for an injury occasioned by such a collision, unless the neglect which caused the collision was of a joint duty owed by both defendants, and that, on failure of proof of a joint duty and joint neglect, neither defendant can be held. If this contention is sound, it is obvious that the declaration was demurrable, for it charged that the railroad company owed to plaintiff a duty to give notice of the passage of its trains across the tracks of the railway company, and that the railway company owed to him a duty to take precautions in carrying him across the tracks of the railroad company, and it averred that each company had neglected to perform the several duties thus charged, and that thereby the collision which injured plaintiff occurred. But the contention is wholly inadmissible, and the declaration would plainly have been good on demurrer. The error arises out of a misconception as to the nature of a joint tort. If two or more persons owe to another the same duty, and by their common neglect of that duty he is injured, doubtless the tort is joint, and upon well-settled principles each, any, or all of the tortfeasors may be held. But when each of two or more persons owe to another a separate duty, which each wrongfully neglects to perform, then, although the duties were diverse and disconnected, and the negligence of each was without concert, if such several neglects concurred and united together in causing injury, the tort is equally joint, and the tortfeasors are subject to a like liability. This doctrine was announced in this court by the chief justice in Newman v. Fowler, 37 N. J. L. 89. The like doctrine was applied by the court of appeals in New York to a case identical with that under consideration. Colegrove v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 20 N. Y. 492. That case has been mentioned with approval in Barrett v. Third Ave. R. Co. 45 N. Y. 628; Slater v. Mercereau, 64 N. Y. 188; Arctic F. Ins. Co. v. Austin, 69 N. Y. 470, 80 Am. Rep. 221. See also Cooper v. Eastern Transp. Co. 75 N. Y. 116. The same view is taken in other courts. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Shacklet, 105 Ill. 364, 44 Am. Rep. 791; Union Transit Co. v. Shacklet, 119 Ill. 232; Cartersville v. Cook, 129 Ill. 152, 4 L. R. A. 721; Cuddy v. Horn, 46 Mich. 596, 41 Am. Rep. 178. I have not discovered any dissent from this doctrine, except in Pennsylvania, the courts of which state, while admitting the general rule, make an exception of cases where the injured party was the passenger of a carrier whose negligence concurred with the negligence of another in producing the injury. The reason of this exception, however, is that those courts adhere to the doctrine of Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, which has always been repudiated in New Jersey, and is now expressly overruled in England. The Bernina, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 58, 13 App. Cas. 1. The Pennsylvania cases are Lockhart v. Lichtenhaler, 46 Pa. 151; Carlisle v. Brisbane, 113 Pa. 544, 57 Am. Rep. 488; Dean v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 129 Pa. 520, 6 L. R. A. 148; Klauder v. McGrath, 35 Pa. 128, 78 Am. Dec. 329; North Pennsylvania Co. v. Mahoney, 57 Pa. 187.

The declaration therefore set out a good cause of action against two joint tortfeasors, and there can be no doubt that in such an action one defendant may be held liable alone if the proof justify it. The verdict against the railroad company should not be disturbed.

The verdict in favor of the railway company is also questioned by the plaintiff.

There was strong evidence of its negligence tending to produce plaintiff's injury, but it was encountered by contradictory evidence. The question was fairly submitted to the jury, and no sufficient reason to disturb their verdict appears.

Let the Circuit Court be advised to discharge both rules.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

A. M. HOOVER et al.

v.

1. Giving lower rates for transportation of coal to a manufacturing company than to a coal dealer is not undue or unreasonable discrimination, in violation of Const. 1874, § 8, of the Act of 1883, which further specifies that the equality of rates required shall be for "a like service from the same place, upon like conditions and under similar circumstances," where the manufacturing company consumes the coal in creating products which furnish a large amount of additional transportation to the carrier,—and especially where the carrier was bound to give such company the lower rate by a contract made years before the coal dealer began business.
2. It is a matter of public history that along the valleys of the Lehigh and Schuylkill rivers there are great numbers of blast furnaces, rolling mills, rail mills, foundries, machine shops, and numerous other manufacturing establishments which consume enormous quantities of the coal output of the state, and at the same time immensely large industry in buying and selling coal for domestic consumption is prosecuted in every village, town, and city in this region.
3. A manufacturing company violates its right to accept lower rates for the transportation of coal than are given to a coal dealer if it sells coal, even to its own employes; and the carrier on notice of such sales must charge such company the same rates that are charged to coal dealers.
4. Notice by a carrier of special rates to other shippers entitled thereto by difference of conditions need not be given to regular shippers in order to protect the carrier from the charge of unreasonable discrimination.
5. The amount of injury suffered by a shipper on account of lower rates given to another shipper for which he may recover from the carrier, under the Act of 1883, cannot be taken without proof to be the difference in the rates charged.

(July 19, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Huntingdon County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the statutory damages for alleged discrimination against plaintiffs in freight rates. Reversed.

In 1881 defendant contracted with the Bellefonte Iron & Nail Company to haul coal under certain conditions from the Snow Shoe district to its works for 80 cents per ton. The agreement was that the coal was to be billed at the usual public rate of 50 cents per ton, and a rebate of 20 cents per ton would be paid by the railroad company to the nail company. In 1889 plaintiffs became retail coal dealers in Bellefonte, and having been charged the regular tariff rates on their coal, without the rebate, and having learned of the contract between the railroad company and the coal company, brought this suit under the Act of June 4, 1883. Defendants presented points which, together with their answers, were as follows:

1. The agreement to charge a uniform rate to the Bellefonte nail works, made in 1881, was binding on the defendant; and its performance was not an undue and unjust discrimination against the plaintiffs. Answer: So far as to the contract being binding on the defendant in 1889 and up to 1891, we are not prepared to affirm the point. This action is not brought to enforce that contract. The question of the contract is, therefore, immaterial and irrelevant. We cannot say, as matter of law, that the contract was binding upon the company. Its terms seem to be indefinite, and whether they could or could not have retreated from it is a question that is not important here; and if it be, we cannot say it was binding upon them. But whether or not the performance of that contract resulted in undue and unjust discrimination against these plaintiffs is a question we submit to you in our general charge. If it operated in a certain manner it would be undue and unjust, and if it did not operate in that manner it would not be undue and unjust. For further answer we refer to our general charge as to the fact of discrimination.

2. The defendant has made no undue charge or unjust discrimination against the plaintiffs if they were charged the same as other buyers and sellers of coal. Answer: This point we cannot affirm. The fact involved in the point will be for the determination of the jury.

3. A lower charge to a manufacturer of nails is not an unjust discrimination to a buyer and seller of coal only. Answer: We cannot affirm that as a principle of law. It may be or may not be, according to the circumstances of the case; but whether, in this case, it resulted in an undue and unjust discrimination must be determined by you under the evidence.

4. As there was no undue discrimination in furnishing facilities for transportation, treble damages cannot be recovered in this case; and the verdict must be for the defendant. Refused.

5. Under all the evidence in the case the verdict must be for the defendant. Answer: We refuse this point because, as the case is presented by the plaintiffs, we submit the question of undue and unjust discrimination to you.

A verdict was returned in favor of plaintiffs and defendants appealed, assigning for error the answers to the above instructions, and also that the judgment was unlawful as conflicting

The Act of 1883 is special with regard to the trade of a common carrier considered as a division of labor or a pursuit, or relatively to the railroad as a special method of domestic transportation. For centuries the pursuit of a common carrier has been private like that of an innkeeper. Each owes duties to the public, but this does not make the pursuit public.

Twelfth Street Market Co. v. Philadelphia & R. Terminal R. Co. 142 Pa. 581.

Mr. George B. Orsady, for appellees:

When a contract of this character is made and plead as a protection, the railroad company is bound to know who the other party to the contract is, and what the effect of enforcing it would be; their duty to the public as a common carrier is not discharged by simply calling a selected friend, a manufacturer of nails, an iron and nail company, or a corporation; they must go farther and allow all of the class, to which the other party in fact belongs, to have the benefit of the same favors. It must be public and not secret; and as in this case, must not be made with one who buys and sells anthracite and bituminous coal in the open markets to all comers, in addition to making muck bar and nails, and by reason of secret rebates is enabled to undersell business rivals in the coal trade.

The contract between a railroad company and a shipper that the latter shall pay the regular established rates of freight the same as all other shippers, and that the company shall pay back to him by way of rebate a certain proportion of freight so charged and paid, whereby a less rate of freight is paid than by the public generally, is void and against public policy.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The third section of the seventeenth article of the Pennsylvania Constitution of 1838 is

"Sec. 3. All individuals, associations, and corporations shall have equal right to have persons and property transported over railroads and canals, and no undue or unreasonable discrimination shall be made, in charges for, or in facilities for, transportation of freight or passengers, within the state, or coming from, or going to any other state. Persons and property transported over any railroad shall be delivered at any station, at charges not exceeding the charges for transportation of persons and property of the same class, in the same direction to any more distant station; but excursion and commutation tickets may be issued at special rates." For the purpose of enforcing the foregoing provision of the constitution, the Legislature enacted the law of the 4th of June, 1883 (Pub. Laws, 73). The first and second sections are as follows: "Section 1. That any undue or unreasonable discrimination by any railroad company or other common carrier or any officer, superintendent, manager, or agent thereof in charges for or in facilities for the transportation of freight within this state or coming from or going to any other state is hereby declared to be unlawful. Sec. 2. No railroad company or other common carrier engaged in the transportation of property, shall charge, demand, or receive from any person, company, or corporation, for the transportation of property, or for any other service, a greater sum than it shall receive from any other person, company, or corporation for a like service from the same place upon like conditions and under similar circumstances; and all concessions in rates and drawbacks shall be allowed to all persons, companies, or corporations alike, for such transportations and services, upon like conditions, under similar circumstances and during the same period of time. Nor shall any such railroad company or common carrier make any undue or unreasonable discrimination between individuals or between individuals and transportation companies, or the furnishing of facilities for transportation. Any violation of this provision shall make the offending company liable to the party injured for damages treble the amount of injury suffered."

The action in the present case was brought to recover treble damages, under the second section of the Act of 1883, for an alleged unjust and unreasonable discrimination against the plaintiffs in charges for freights on coal shipped from Snow Shoe to Bellefonte, within this state, over lines of railroad owned or controlled by the defendant company. The period of time covered by the claim of the plaintiffs was from September, 1889, to April, 1891, and it was alleged that the plaintiffs were overcharged 20 cents per ton on 10,607 tons carried over the defendant's road during the time named. Substantially the defense set up by the defendant was that in the year 1881 certain citizens of Bellefonte and vicinity, having in contemplation the erection of a manufacturing plant at Bellefonte for the manufacture of nails, waited upon the defendant company, through Gov. A. G. Curtin, who represented them, and endeavored to make, and did make, a special contract that if the plant was erected the company should not charge them more than 80 cents per ton for all coal shipped from Snow Shoe to the works at Bellefonte; that such contract was made, and the plant was then erected, and the manufacture of nails thereat was carried on from 1881 until and after the time covered by the plaintiffs' claim; that the plaintiffs were coal dealers only, who merely bought and sold coal, and returned no freight to the defendant as the product of any manufacturing operations; that they did not do any business as coal dealers, in fact, did not come into existence, until the year 1889, eight years after the nail company was organized and commenced business, and while the defendant company was subject to, and bound by, the terms of their contract with the nail company; and that the plaintiffs were not discriminated against at all, because they were charged only the same freights as were charged to all others who were coal dealers only, and it was contended, as matter of law, by the defendant, that the discrimination in the rates of freight between the nail company and the plaintiffs was not, in view of all the circumstances of the case, an undue or unreasonable discrimination, within the meaning of the constitutional provision or of the Act of 1883. In reply to points put to the court on the trial on this subject the learned judge who tried the cause charged the jury that the question of unjust discrimination was a question of fact to be determined by them, and he refused the defendant's point on that subject; but he did, nevertheless, also instruct the jury, as matter of law, that the distinction between a dealer and a manufacturer, set up by the defendant, was not a defense, and would not exempt the defendant from the penalties of the Act of 1883. He said: "The defense claim, as an exemption from the penalty of this act, the fact that the one may be classed as a manufacturer, and the other simply as a dealer. I do not regard the law as making that classification. I think that the classification which the Act of 1883 intended was a classification relating to the carriage, and not to the shipper himself. It may charge more for one kind of freight than for another. It may charge more for live freight than for wood, coal, iron, or ore. It may charge more for a certain portion of its road than it does for others. These things are governed largely by the expense to which the common carrier is subjected. Common carriers may charge more when they ship but a small quantity than they do when they ship by wholesale. . . . But I do not think the law, or the policy of the law, permits them to classify the kind of dealer; that is, that they may make a discrimination between the character of the consignor or consignee ordinarily. . . . The evidence here is that each shipment was by carloads, during the same period of time, and under like circumstances. The fact that one party was a manufacturer and the other party were coal dealers we think is not material in this case." The same idea was repeated, and a positive instruction was given that, upon the facts stated in the plaintiffs' point, "the service and conditions were alike, and the circumstances the same." We regard this as a binding instruction to the jury upon the law of the case, which left them no discretion but to find for the plaintiffs; the only question for them being the amount of damages to be found.

After a very patient examination of all the testimony and of all the authorities cited on both sides, we find ourselves unable to agree with the learned court below either as to their interpretation of the law or their judgment upon the facts. So far as the law of the case is concerned, there is no doubt that the Act of 1883 does not prohibit all discrimination. It prohibits only discrimination which is undue or unreasonable, and the prohibited discrimination is further limited by the consideration that it must be "for a like service, from the same place, upon like conditions, and under similar circumstances." If, therefore, the discrimination in a given case is upon conditions which are not alike, and circumstances which are not similar, the act is inapplicable, and its penalties are not incurred. Nor can we regard this question as a question of fact for the jury alone. The ascertainment of the actual facts of the case, of course, is for them, but where these are established by undisputed testimony, or are presented by proper points which cover the facts in evidence, the resulting question is whether the facts established, or undisputed, or exhibited in properly drawn points, bring the case within the operation of the words or necessary meaning of the statute; and that, of course, is a question of law for the court, for the question then is one of interpretation. Do the words of the statute extend to and embrace the established facts of the case, or do they not? If they do not, the statute is not applicable; if they do, it is, and the court alone, as in all other similar cases, must determine that question. It is beyond the function of the jury.

Let us now recur to the well-established and the undisputed facts of the case, and inquire whether there are any, and, if so, what, differences in the conditions and in the circumstances which attended the shipping of the coal to the plaintiffs and to the Bellefonte Iron & Nail Company, respectively. In the first place, we find the undisputed testimony of Gov. Curtin to the effect that in 1881, and prior to the erection of the nail works, he called upon the defendant's officials, for the purpose of having them agree to carry the coal for the prospective works at 80 cents per ton. This testimony is clear, distinct, positive, and entirely uncontradicted, and it was followed by proof that the contract was carried out by the defendant after some delay in the adjustment. Gov. Curtin said: "I went to Philadelphia for the purpose of having the arrangement made. I there saw Mr. Creighton, who was the freight agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and, after some time in negotiating, he agreed that the freight should be reduced to thirty cents per ton where the amount consumed per day was twenty tons or more. He wrote me a letter, in which it was settled and fixed at thirty cents per ton." He then explained the loss of the letter, and his search for it, and said: "But of the contents of the letter I am perfectly clear in my recollection of it, and it was one of the inducements which contributed to the erection of the nail works in this place. There were other parties in this place engaged in other industries which would have had a right to the reduction, notably Valentine's works in operation, and the glass works, when they used the quantity indicated." As the court below charged directly against any effect being attached to the subject-matter of this testimony, the defendant is entitled to have it regarded as proof of an established fact; and, this being so, we have the following differences in the conditions and circumstances attending the shipments to the plaintiffs and the nail works, respectively: (1) The defendant, when it began carrying coal for the plaintiffs, in September, 1889, was bound by the terms of a contract made with the nail works eight years before, and during all the intervening time the plaintiffs were not even in existence as a firm, and were doing no coal business whatever. We know of no reason why that contract was not binding on the defendant, especially as Gov. Curtin testified, without contradiction, that all the other industries at Bellefonte were entitled to the benefit of it, if they took the requisite quantity of twenty tons daily. This being so, the defendant's hands were tied, and it could not charge the nail works 50 cents a ton if it had desired to do so. This constituted a most material difference in the conditions and circumstances of the shipments. In an action by the nail works to recover the 20 cents a ton higher charge, if it had been made, to equalize it with the rate charged to the plaintiffs, it would have been no defense to say that a company of coal dealers had lately come into existence who were getting coal over the same road from the same point, and therefore the defendant would be obliged to charge 50 cents per ton thereafter. (2) The nail works were bound to take twenty tons every day, while the plaintiffs were under no such obligation. (3) The plaintiffs were dealers in coal merely, while the nail company was a manufacturer of fabrics, and itself consumed the coal it received. They were therefore not competitors in the same business, and a lower rate to the manufacturer would not, under the contract, affect the business of the plaintiffs injuriously. It is true there was proof that the nail company did sell some coal to their own workmen, but, as it is not shown that the defendant had any knowledge of this fact, they cannot be held responsible for it. (4) The business of the plaintiffs paid but one freight to the defendant, while the business of the nail company paid not only that freight, to wit, for hauling the coal to the nail works, but also, in addition to that, another, and entirely independent, freight, to the defendant on all the products manufactured by the nail company. This was a most important and vital difference in the conditions and circumstances of the two shipments. The authorities are very clear and strong that where an additional freight is obtained by means of the lower charge, the discrimination is justified, both at common law and under the statutes. The importance of this factor in the discussion is at once manifested by certain testimony given by the plaintiffs, through one of their witnesses, L. E. Munson, who was the superintendent of the Bellefonte Iron & Nail Company. On examination by counsel for the plaintiff he was asked: "Question. What did you say the capacity of the nail works was as to outgoing freight?" Answer. About thirty tons a day; thirty or forty tons a day. Q. That would be three hundred kegs, would it? A. We have a capacity of five hundred kegs. Q. That was your outgoing freight? A. I suppose part of the time we made a hundred thousand kegs a year; from seventy-five to one hundred and twenty-five thousand kegs a year. Q. Would that mean about one car a day on a three-hundred kegs basis? A. Yes, sir. Then we shipped considerable muck bar. Q. Were you shipping muck bar at the time you were shipping nails? A. Sometimes; when we were making nails out of steel rods. Q. Were you making muck bar at the time you were making nails? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were you making bar iron, and shipping it, at the time you were making nails? A. Yes, sir." As the foregoing testimony was given by the plaintiffs, and was not at all contradicted by the defendant, the plaintiffs are bound by it, and it must be taken as establishing the fact which it develops; and the fact thus established is of the greatest possible consequence in the case. It entirely destroys, in our opinion, the fundamental allegation of the plaintiffs that the shipments of coal to the plaintiffs and the nail works were made "upon like conditions, and under similar circumstances;" for the shipments of coal to the plaintiffs yielded but one freight to the defendant, while the shipments to the nail works yielded not only the same incoming freight on the coal of at least twenty tons a day, but an additional outgoing freight of thirty to forty tons a day of fabrics manufactured by the nail works. In view of this testimony, how can it possibly be said that the conditions of the two shipments are alike, and their circumstances similar? That a railroad company may lawfully secure to itself so important an addition to its business by making a lower charge to one customer than to others is fully established by the authorities, as we shall presently see. (5) The manufacture and sale by the nail works of nails and muck bar were outside of, and entirely harmless to, the business of the plaintiffs, and hence a lower price for the coal consumed by the nail works was neither an undue nor an unreasonable discrimination against the plaintiffs, because it was an immaterial circumstance as affecting their business. This is self-evident. The plaintiffs did not deal in nails or muck bar, and the sale of those commodities by the nail company necessarily could have no effect upon the plaintiff's business, which was the selling of coal to persons who consumed it. (6) As to all persons who did sell coal at Bellefonte, they were charged the same freights precisely as were charged to the plaintiffs. This is the undisputed testimony.

Let us now see what is the voice of the authorities upon the subject of discriminations in freight charges by carrying companies. The subject is an old one. Prior to any statutes in England or in this country, the common law had pronounced upon the rights and duties of carriers and freighters, and in the enactment of statutes little more has been done than to embody in them the well-known principles of the common law. It happens, somewhat singularly, that the very question we are now considering, of a discrimination in the rates charged to coal dealers and to manufacturers who use coal as a fuel, does not appear to have arisen; and yet it is very certain that such discrimination does prevail, and has prevailed for a long time, on all lines of railway and canal. It is highly probable that the absence of litigation upon such discrimination is due to the general sentiment of its fairness and justness. Within the writer's knowledge, in the section of the state in which he lives, a much greater difference between the rates charged to dealers and those charged to manufacturers by the coal-carrying companies has always existed, and now exists, without any question as to its justness or its legality. It is matter of public history that along the valleys of the Lehigh and the Schuylkill there are great numbers of blast furnaces, rolling mills, rail mills, founderies, machine shops, and numerous other manufacturing establishments, which consume enormous quantities of the coal output of the state, and, at the same time, in every village, town, and city which abound in these regions, an immensely large industry in the buying and selling of coal for domestic consumption is also prosecuted. And what is true of the eastern end of the state is without doubt equally true throughout the interior and western portions of the commonwealth, where similar conditions prevail. Yet from no part of our great state has ever yet arisen a litigation which called in question the legality or the wisdom or the strict justice of a discrimination favorable to the manufacturing industries as contrasted with the coal-selling industries. This fact can scarcely be accounted for, except upon the theory that such discrimination as has thus far transpired, has not been felt to be undue or unreasonable, or contrary to legal warrant. In point of fact, it is perfectly well known and appreciated that the output of freights from the great manufacturing centers upon our lines of transportation constitutes one of the chief sources of the revenues which sustain them financially. Yet no part of this income is derived from those who are mere buyers and sellers of coal. When the freight is paid upon the coal they buy, the revenue to be derived from that coal is at an end. Not so, however, with the revenue from the coal that is carried to the manufacturers. That coal is consumed on the premises in the creation of an endless variety of products, which must be put back upon the transporting lines, enhanced in bulk and weight by the other commodities which enter into the manufactured product, and is then distributed to the various markets where they are sold. In addition to this, a manufacturing plant requires other commodities besides coal to conduct its operations, whereas a coal dealer takes nothing but his coal, and the freight derived by the carrier from the transportation of these commodities forms an important addition to its traffic, and constitutes a condition of the business which has no existence in the business of carrying coal to those who are coal dealers only. Thus a blast furnace requires great quantities of iron ore, limestone, coke, sand, machinery, lumber, fire bricks, and other materials, for the maintenance of its structures and the conduct of its business none of which are necessary to a mere coal-selling business. These are some of the leading considerations which establish a radical difference in the conditions and the circumstances which are necessarily incident to the two kinds of business we are considering. Another important incident which distinguishes them is that the establishment of manufacturing industries and the conducting of their business necessitates the employment of numbers of workmen and other persons whose services are needed and these with their families create settlements and new centers of population resulting in villages, towns, boroughs, and cities, according to the extent and variety of the industries established, and all these, in turn, furnish new and additional traffic to the lines of transportation. But nothing of this kind results from the mere business of coal selling. In fact that business is one of the results of the manufacturing business, and is not a co-ordinate with it. The business of the coal dealer is promoted by the concentration of population which results from the establishment of manufacturing industries, and these two kinds of business are not competitive in their essential characteristics, but naturally proceed together, side by side, the coal selling increasing as the manufacturing increases in magnitude and extent.

These considerations are generic, and are suggested for the purpose of illustrating the differences between the fundamental conditions and circumstances of the two industries we are considering. Recurring now to the authorities, we find that the British Statute of 17 & 18 Vict., chap. 81 (1854), is perhaps the earliest instance of direct legislation upon this subject. That statute prohibited "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage" in transportation charges, but lacked the restricting words "from the same place, upon like conditions, and under similar circumstances," which appear in our Act of 1893. Yet it was held in Ransome v. Eastern Counties R. Co., 1 C. B. N. S. 437, and Oxlade v. Northeastern R. Co., Id. 454, that it was competent for a railway company to enter into a special agreement for the carriage of goods for a particular individual or company at a lower rate in respect of large quantities of goods and longer distances than for one who sends them in small quantities and shorter distances. In Ransome's Case it was said by Cresswell, J., in delivering the opinion of the court: "After a good deal of consideration, we think that the fair interests of the railway ought to be taken into the account." In the case of Nicholson v. Great Western R. Co., 5 C. B. N. S. 386, the same doctrine was held, and it was also held that the second section of the Railway Traffic Act (17 & 18 Vict. chap. 31) was not contravened by a railway company carrying at a lower rate, in consideration of a guaranty of large quantities and full train loads at regular periods, provided the real object of the company be to obtain thereby a greater remunerative profit, by the diminished cost of carriage, although the effect may be to exclude from the lower rate those persons who cannot give such a guaranty. Crowder, J., said in the opinion: "When the statute speaks of 'undue and unreasonable preference or advantage,' and 'undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage,' it uses language implying that there may be advantage to one person or one class of traffic and prejudice to another, which would not be within the act of parliament. The preference and prejudice must be 'undue' or 'unreasonable' to be within the statute, and although, in the case now before the court, it is quite manifest that the Raubon Coal Company have many and important advantages in carrying their coal on the Great Western Railroad, as against the complainants and other coal owners in the forest of Dean, still the question remains, are they 'undue' or 'unreasonable' advantages? This mainly depends upon the adequacy of the consideration given in return to the railway company for the advantages afforded to the Raubon Coal Company." The justice then proceeds to show that it was to the advantage and profit of the railway company to carry coals for the Raubon Company at a lower rate than for the complainants, and concludes, in the language of the syllabus above quoted, that this was no violation of the act. All of the foregoing cases recognize the proposition that if the interest of the railway company was subserved by charging the lower rate to the one company than to other, the act was not violated. That conclusion was reached in a case where the complainant was in the same business with the favored company, and was injuriously affected by the discrimination, but the court held that this was permissible if the interests of the railway company were thereby subserved. With how much greater force can it be said that here, where there is no competition in the disposal of the coal of the plaintiffs and the products of the nail company, and also where the inducement to the defendant to make the lower rate for the nail company is a largely increased traffic on the defendant's road, neither the letter nor the spirit of our Act of 1883 was violated.

The doctrine of the cases above cited was also declared in the case of Baxendale v. Great Western R. Co., 5 C. B. N. S. 386, where Cockburn, J., said: "If an arrangement were made by a railway company whereby persons bringing a larger amount of traffic to the railway should have their goods carried on more favorable terms than those bringing a less quantity, a court might uphold such an arrangement as an ordinary incident of commercial economy, provided the same advantage were extended to all persons under the like circumstances." This latter incident would of course be essential where all of the favored class were in the same business. In the case of Messenger v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 37 N. J. L. 531, 18 Am. Rep. 754, cited for the appellee, the court was careful to say that "it must not be inferred that a common carrier, in adjusting his price, cannot regard the particular circumstances of the particular transportation. Many considerations may properly enter into the agreement for carriage or the establishment of rates, such as the quantity carried, its nature, risks, the expense of carriage at different periods of time, and the like; but he has no right to give an exclusive advantage or preference in that respect to some over others for carriage in the course of his business." In that case there was a very clear preference to one party over all others in the same business by the railroad company giving him a specific drawback upon freights on hogs carried from the same points, and, of course, as this was direct preference over all others, it was in violation of the law. But that decision has no application to this case. In the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 145 U. S. 268, 36 L. ed. 699, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 92, it was held that the issue by a railway company engaged in interstate commerce of a party-rate ticket for the transportation of ten or more persons at a rate less than that charged to a single individual for a like transportation on the same trip did not make an unjust or unreasonable charge, nor an unjust discrimination, now give an undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to the purchasers of the party-rate ticket, within the meaning of the several provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887. There was much discussion of the general subject of the prohibition of the general statute in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in this case, from which it will be instructive to present some quotations. The English Traffic Act of 1854, above referred to, was fully considered, and the Cases of Oxlade and Ransome, and others hereinbefore cited, were recognized and followed. Among other things, it was said by Mr. Justice Brown, who delivered the opinion: "It is not all discriminations or preferences that fall within the inhibition of the statute; only such as are unjust and unreasonable. For instance, it would be obviously unjust to charge A. a greater sum than B. for a single trip from Washington to Pittsburg; but if A. agrees not only to go, but to return by the same route, it is no injustice to B. to permit him to do so for a reduced fare, since the services are not alike, nor the circumstances and conditions substantially similar, as required by section 2, to make an unjust discrimination. Indeed, the possibility of just discrimination and reasonable preferences is recognized by these sections in declaring what shall be deemed unjust. . . . In order to constitute an unjust discrimination under section 2, the carrier must charge or receive directly from one person a greater or less compensation than from another, or must accomplish the same thing indirectly, by a special-rate rebate, or other device; but in either case it must be for a "like and contemporaneous service, in the transportation of a like kind of traffic, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions." To bring the present case within the words of this section we must assume that the transportation of ten persons on a single ticket is substantially identical with the transportation of one, and, in view of the universally accepted fact that a man may buy, contract, or manufacture on a large scale cheaper proportionately than upon a small scale, this is impossible. In this connection we quote with approval from the opinion of Judge Jackson in the court below: "To come within the inhibition of said sections the differences must be made under like conditions; that is, there must be contemporaneous service in the transportation of like kinds of traffic, under substantially the same circumstances and conditions. . . . In short, the substance of all these decisions is that railway companies are only bound to give the same terms to all persons alike, under the same conditions and circumstances, and that any fact which produces an inequality of conditions and a change of circumstances justifies an inequality of charge. . . . But, in so far as relates to the question of 'undue preference,' it may be presumed that congress, in adopting the language of the English act, had in mind the construction given to these words by the English courts, and intended to incorporate them into the statute. McDonald v. Hovey, 110 U. S. 619, 28 L. ed. 269.

In the case of Fitchburg R. Co. v. Gage, 12 Gray, 398, the right to discriminate upon the basis of a carriage for a certain time, and in certain quantities, was declared. The claim of the shipper was for an equality of charges for shipments of ice with charges for shipments of bricks, because they were of the same class of freight; but the claim was not allowed. The court said, by way of illustration of the principle upon which there might be a lawful discrimination of rates upon the same class of goods: "If, for special reasons, in isolated cases, the carrier sees fit to stipulate for the carriage of goods or merchandise of any class for individuals for a certain time, or in certain quantities, for less compensation than what is the usual, necessary, and reasonable rate, he may undoubtedly do so without entitling all other persons and parties to the same advantage and relief." And this court said in the case of Shipper v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 47 Pa. 338: "We are not prepared to say that a railroad company may not discriminate in its rate of tolls in favor of domestic trade over foreign, in favor of home products over those which are extraterritorial; especially when the railroad lies wholly within the state. Ownership may not be a reasonable ground for a distinction, but weight, bulk, value, place of production, and many other things, may be."

These cases are cited as illustrations of various reasons and principles upon which lawful discriminations may be made even in charges for the carriage of the same goods over the same roads, and to be used for the same purposes. But in the present case, where not only a particular quantity must be furnished to the railroad every day, but the goods at the point of delivery are to be used for totally different purposes, which do not conflict or compete with each other, the reason for a discrimination has an infinitely greater force. In Hutchinson on Carriers (page 353), after a protracted review of all the cases, (and they are very numerous), the writer sums up the result thus: "Mere inequality in charges does not, therefore, of itself amount to an unjust discrimination. It only becomes such when a discrimination is made in the rates charged for transportation of goods of the same class, of different shippers, under like circumstances and conditions. So a mere reduction from the established rate is not necessarily an unjust discrimination, but it becomes such when it is either intended, or has a natural tendency, to injure another shipper in his business, and destroy his trade by giving to the favored shipper a practical monopoly of the business."

We come now to consider the case of Borda v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 141 Pa. 484. It was an action of case brought against the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company by the plaintiffs, who were shippers of coal, to recover damages for alleged illegal discriminations in the freight charged to the plaintiffs on shipments of coal over the defendant's road, as against lower rates charged to other shippers over the same road. The case was, by agreement of the parties, referred to Mr. Peter McCall as referee, who made a most exhaustive and elaborate report denying the claim of the plaintiffs, and his report was affirmed by this court. As the shipments had been made prior to the adoption of our Constitution of 1874, a preliminary question arose, whether it was the duty of the defendant to carry without discrimination. The referee held that such was the duty of the defendant, saying: "I regard it, then, as settled law in this state that a railroad company, a common carrier, owes a duty of equality to every citizen; and I adopt the position taken by Mr. Bullitt in argument that railroad companies have no right to make any undue discrimination or preference in their charges, and a charge made to one shipper higher than another, for the same service, under like circumstances, constitutes undue preference and discrimination, and, by consequence, renders the charge unreasonable. Such is the general rule, and it is vastly important to the general public that there be no undue relaxation of this rule; for, exercising, as they practically do, a monopoly of transportation on their roads, railway managers have in their hands a tremendous power, by discrimination, to enrich one man and ruin another. The equality, however, which is thus prescribed is not a strict and literal equality under all circumstances, however varying and different. It is rather an equality in the sense of freedom from unreasonable discrimination. It is only unjust, undue, or unreasonable discrimination against which the law has set its canon. Arbitrary discrimination is illegal; is discrimination made with a view of giving advantage to one person. But the truism that circumstances alter cases applies here, and under a different state of circumstances a discrimination may be reasonable and lawful, which, were the circumstances the same, would be undue and unreasonable. In order to render lawful an inequality of charge, the goods must be carried under different circumstances, and the question whether the difference is material or essential arises in each particular case." The writer regards the foregoing as the most precise and the most felicitous expression of the law upon the general subject under consideration that he has met with, and therefore quotes it entire.

The claim of the plaintiffs was to recover damages to the amount of upwards of $60,000 for unjust discrimination in favor of Audenried & Co., rival coal shippers to the plaintiffs, by the payment to Audenried & Co. of rebates on coal shipped from Port Richmond to points beyond New Brunswick at the rate of $1.65 for steamer coal, and other rates for other grades. It was proved that these rebates were paid under agreements between Audenried & Co. and the defendant, made at the beginning of the season, and to continue throughout the season, and the referee was of opinion, and so found, that these contracts for continuous shipments during the whole season at fixed rates constituted such a difference in the conditions and circumstances of the shipments for Audenried & Co. and the plaintiffs, respectively, as to justify the discrimination, and prevent it from being illegal. In expressing his conclusions the referee says: "The defendant's case denies that the discrimination was willful, and made with any such design as imputed by the plaintiffs. It rests upon the ground that the payment of the drawbacks to Audenried & Co. was under an honest and bona fide belief that they were entitled to them, under an arrangement by which, in consideration of their having made contracts early in the spring for delivery of coal at fixed prices throughout the season, they were allowed the drawbacks in question. . . . On the whole, I am of opinion, upon the best consideration I have been able to give the subject, that the defendant did not pay to Audenried & Co. the drawbacks complained of in the first and additional count of the declaration willfully, and with intent to enable them to increase their business at the expense of the plaintiffs, but that it paid the same in good faith, under the belief that Audenried & Co. had made contracts in the spring at a fixed price for the delivery of the coal. . . . I am of opinion, therefore, that the defendant could legally have allowed the drawbacks to Audenried & Co. which it did allow, if that firm had had contracts made in the early part of the season for delivery of coal in the eastern market at fixed prices. In that case, although the service rendered, to wit, the transportation, would have been the same as that rendered to the plaintiffs, yet the circumstances were different, and the difference of circumstances would have justified the discrimination." While this court did not review the testimony taken before the referee, because it was not before us, we affirmed the judgment in favor of the defendant upon the report, conceding the facts to be as found by the referee. It will be perceived, therefore, that in that case the circumstance that the coal was shipped for Audenried & Co., under contracts made at the beginning of the season, at fixed prices, and to continue throughout the season, was held a sufficient reply to a charge of unjust discrimination, although the commodity shipped was the same, to wit, anthracite coal, and the shipments were between the same points, to wit, from Port Richmond to points east of New Brunswick, and the plaintiffs were engaged in the same business as Audenried & Co., whereas here the plaintiffs were not engaged in the same business as the Bellefonte Nail Company. There could not be any competition between them in the products sold, and the rate at which coal was carried for the nail company was a matter of absolute indifference to the plaintiffs. We repeat again that we do not regard the sales of coal by the nail company to its own employes as of any moment in the case, (1) because there is no proof that they were made with the knowledge of the defendant, but there is positive and uncontradicted proof that they were made without such knowledge; (2) because the defendant is not responsible for such sales by the nail company; (3) because the coal carried by the defendant for the nail company was not carried for purposes of sale at retail, but for the purpose of manufacturing nails and muck bar; (4) because there is no proof that the plaintiffs sustained any damage by reason of the sales of the nail company to their employes. But it must be understood, and we so decide, "that a manufacturing company has no right to engage in the business of selling coal, even to its own employes; and if it does so, and the transporting company is notified of such selling, it must thereupon cease to carry coal to the manufacturing company at any less rate than it charges to the coal dealers, or incur the penalties of unjust discrimination.

The ruling of the court below would require that coal carried to blast furnaces, rolling-mills, rail mills, founderies, and all other manufacturing enterprises, should be carried for the same price as the coal carried to any retail dealer in the same locality, though the quantity consumed by the former might extend to many thousands of tons each year, while the quantity carried for the latter might be a few hundred tons only, and although the manufacturing companies gave back to the carrier many thousands of tons of freight each year, while the retail dealer gave back none, and although the business of the manufacturer in no wise competes with the business of the dealer. We think the differences in these respects between these two kinds of business are such as to justify a discrimination in the rates of freight charged to each, and the conditions of the two are not alike, and their circumstances are not similar, within the meaning of our Act of 1883, and therefore there can be no recovery in this case. The fact that the payment of the rebates was not known to the plaintiffs is of no possible consequence, both because they had no right to know it, under our present ruling that the circumstances were not similar, and the conditions not alike, and also because, if the discriminating charge was lawful, the absence of notice to the plaintiffs would not make it unlawful. The same point was made and ruled in the Borda Case. The referee said: "But in point of law I do not think that the duty of giving notice to the world of every special rate rests upon the carrier, under penalty of being guilty of unlawful discrimination by his omission to give such notice. How and to whom is such notice to be given?"

It remains only to be added that differences of freight rates on coal to manufactures and to mere dealers are, and have been for many years, in universal practice, and not a single case other than this has as yet reached the courts of last resort in England or in the United States, questioning the entire legality and propriety of such differences, and that circumstance is ample proof that both the professional and the lay mind have assented to the practice.

Speaking upon a similar subject,—the difference in passenger rates upon ordinary tickets and thousand-mile tickets or go and return tickets,—the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 145 U. S. 263, 36 L. ed. 699, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 92, said: "In view of the fact, however, that every railway company issues such tickets; that there is no reported case, state or federal, wherein their illegality has been questioned; that there is no such case in England; and that the practice is universally acquiesced in by the public,—it would seem that the issuing of such tickets should not be held an unjust discrimination or an unreasonable preference to the persons traveling upon them." On the question of damages the court below charged the jury: "If the nail works paid twenty cents less freight per ton on their coal, they had that much of an advantage over others; and the law would seem, in the mind of the court, to fix that excess as the measure of the plaintiffs' damages." We think this was serious error. The Act of 1883 contains no language justifying an instruction that the party injured can recover three times the amount of the difference in the rates charged. The words of the act are: "Any violation of this provision shall make the offending company or common carrier liable to the party injured for damages treble the amount of injury suffered." The "amount of injury suffered" is the measure of the single damages to be allowed. But it does not at all follow that the amount of injury suffered is the difference in the rates charged. It might be, or it might not be, but, in any event, it must be a subject of proof, and there was no proof in the case of the actual damage sustained. How does it follow that because the defendant company paid in 1889 to the nail company a rebate of some $6,000 on all the shipments that had been made from 1881, and a few sums thereafter, the plaintiffs suffered damage to any extent? In point of fact the nail company paid the full freight of 50 cents a ton net during all these years, and their claim for rebates was not adjusted until 1889. How, then, does it appear that damage was suffered by the plaintiffs in consequence of the payment of the rebates to the nail company? It does not appear that the plaintiffs sold their coal for any less than the current market price at any time except when they and the other dealers were engaged in a war of prices, and sold it, far below actual cost in a struggle to capture the market, and it does not appear but that the plaintiffs would have sold their coal at 20 cents less than they did if they had received the rebate. The natural inference is that that is precisely what they would have done in the contest for the market. But of all this there is not a word of testimony, and yet it is only actual damage that they can recover. The proof for the defendant was that they never cut the market price to their men, but maintained it even when the coal dealers of the town were slaughtering each other's trade by selling below cost. As three times the actual damage is the penalty the defendant would have to pay if the judgment were sustained, they have a right to require very clear and definite proof as to what the actual damage was. When blast furnaces and great iron mills are built, they are not placed in cities or towns, but in the open country, where land is abundant and cheap, and of course on the line of a railroad. When they are established there is no population at the place of erection. The railroad companies are very willing to make as favorable terms as possible for freights on all the materials that are brought to the plants, and on all products that are carried from them, because they get a largely increased business from such enterprises. When the works are erected, houses are built for the men and officials of the companies. After that come the usual accessories required to supply the wants of the population, to wit, merchants, tradesmen, mechanics, butchers, bakers, grocers, and, among others, coal dealers. But the moment the last of these arrive, if the principles which prevailed in the court below in this case are correct, the whole freight system agreed upon between the transporter and the manufacturer theretofore must be changed and advanced to the freight rates charged to the retail dealers, or else all the rates charged to such dealers must be lowered to conform to the rates charged to the manufacturer. If this is not done, the manufacturer incurs the risk of being visited years afterwards with claims for treble damages, which may embrace any period of six years, and, as all the dealers have the same right of action in this regard that any of them has, and every town or city along the line has some or many retail coal dealers and manufacturing establishments also within its limits, it is easy to see that the aggregate of such claims many soon absorb the entire property and assets of the strongest transporting companies of the state. We do not find anything in the law that renders necessary or possible any such results as these, and we think it wiser and better to administer the law so that the rights and interests of all may be conserved within rational and sensible limits.

We sustain the first, second, third, and fifth assignments of error. The fourth and sixth assignments have no merit, and are not sustained.

Judgment reversed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT

William E. KOPP et al., Appts.,

v.

Cora E. REITER.

(146 Ill. 487.)

A deed placed in escrow but not delivered cannot be regarded as a sufficient memorandum of a parol agreement for the sale of the land to satisfy the statute of frauds, where, it does not recite the terms of the contract.

(March 31, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of complainant in an action brought to cancel a certain contract and trust deed as a cloud on complainant's title. Affirmed.

NOTE.—Undelivered deed as memorandum to satisfy statute of frauds.

There appears to be some conflict of authorities as to whether an undelivered deed will satisfy the statute of frauds, but some cases that sustain such a contract do so on the ground that the deed embodies the substance of the contract, giving parties consideration, description and terms of sale. Jenkins v. Harrison, 86 Ala. 845; Ma Gee v. Blankenship, 96 N. C. 563; Bowles v. Woodson, 6 Gratt. 78; Griel v. Lomax, 89 Ala. 430; Johnston v. Jones, 85 Ala. 288.

And the same is held where the deed supplies the terms of contract, taken in connection with other writings. Thayer v. Luoce, 23 Ohio St. 62.

The same was held in Work v. Cowhick, 81 Ill. 317, although one of the judges in this case puts his decision on the ground that the statute of frauds does not apply to a sale made by an executor under an order of court, under Act July 1, 1874.

But other cases hold without discussing the question whether the terms of the contract are fully recited in the deed that a deed which is not delivered will not of itself constitute a memorandum of contract so as to satisfy the statute of frauds, in an action by the grantor against the grantee. Sands v. Thompson, 43 Ind. 18; Graham v. Theis, 47 Ga. 479; Caggar v. Lansing, 48 N. Y. 550, reversing 57 Barb. 421; Allebach v. Godshalk, 116 Pa. 329, 19 W. N. C. 445.

And that it is not sufficient, even if vendor has it registered, although the vendee had altered with his own hand a draft of the conveyance. Hawkins v. Holmes, 1 P. Wms. 770.

So an undelivered deed destroyed by consent of vendee will not be held to be a sufficient contract where the land is attempted to be sold under execution against the vendee. Sullivan v. O'Neal, 66 Tex. 423.

A deed from A to B undelivered is not evidence in favor of C in an action by him against A for breach of the contract of sale where there is no writing to connect A and C and B never performed his part. Henderson v. Beard, 51 Ark. 433.

And a deed undelivered is not of itself sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds, in an action to compel an exchange of lands, and this is held on the ground that the contract is not complete without delivery. Nichols v. Oppermann, 6 Wash. 618.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

The original bill in this case was filed in the circuit court of Cook county on July 8, 1891, by the appellee Cora E. Reiter, against the appellant William P. Kopp, the appellee Edward Reiter, and B. F. Cronkrite and Henry M. Bacon, for the purpose of removing the contract and trust deed herein-after described as clouds upon her title to a lot owned by her, and situated in the town of Hyde Park, in said county. Subsequently, the appellants William A. Hammond and Frank C. Vierling, claiming to be the real purchasers of the lot in Kopp's name, were made defendants. Answers were filed to the original bill, and a cross-bill and amended cross-bill were filed by Kopp, Hammond, and Vierling against Cora E. and Edward Reiter,

And the same was held in an action by vendee against the vendor. Overman v. Kerr, 17 Iowa, 485.

And the same was held in an action by a vendee against his vendor, where a deed by vendor and mortgage by vendee had been executed but not delivered. Wier v. Batdorf, 24 Neb. 83; Comer v. Baldwin, 16 Minn. 172; Parker v. Parker, 1 Gray 409.

And the same applied in an action by the executor of a vendor against the vendee. Day v. Lacasse, 85 Me. 242.

So it was held in an action against a vendor to compel specific performance, that a deed which is not delivered and that does not contain the whole contract, there being no other memorandum in writing, will not satisfy the statute of frauds. Thomas v. Sowards, 25 Wis. 631.

And the same was held in an action by vendee against the vendor to compel specific performance. Campbell v. Thomas, 43 Wis. 437, 24 Am. Rep. 427; Swain v. Burnette, 89 Cal. 564.

An undelivered deed was not sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds, in a suit by the vendee against another purchaser from his vendor with notice, where a letter offering a certain price for the property which was not described was accepted. Freeland v. Charnley, 80 Ind. 132.

So a bill of sale of personalty and crop setting forth that it was on a tract of land which "is this day conveyed by me to F. P." that is signed together with a deed that is undelivered will not be a sufficient contract in an action by vendee against vendor. Popp v. Swanke, 68 Wis. 364.

So where possession of the property has been taken under an undelivered deed, the same was held sufficient coupled with the fact of part performance. Parrell v. McKinley, 9 Gratt. 1, 68 Am. Dec. 212; Hart v. Carroll, 85 Pa. 508.

And where the possession of an executed deed has been obtained by the vendee by fraud, if such deed is relied upon by the vendor, it will be regarded as an executed contract, in a suit by vendor for the purchase money. Smith v. Arthur, 110 N. C. 400.

So a deed executed in blank and left in escrow to be filled when sale is made may after delivery be enforced as a contract to convey. Blacknall v. Parish, 59 N. C. 70, 78 Am. Dec. 232.

praying for a specific performance of said contract, which cross-bills were answered by the defendants thereto, and in the answers the statute of frauds was pleaded. The bill was afterwards dismissed as to Cronkrite upon his delivering into the hands of the clerk of the court the said contract and the $250 therein mentioned. The cause was referred to a master to take the evidence and report his findings thereon. Upon the hearing, the circuit court decreed in favor of the complainant in the original bill, granting the relief therein prayed, and dismissed the cross-bill, ordering the clerk to pay over the $250 to said Kopp, and directing Bacon, the trustee, to release the trust deed. From this decree the case is brought here by appeal.

On December 27, 1890, and prior thereto and thereafter, the appellee Cora E. Reiter was the owner in her own right of the lot in question. On that day her husband, Edward Reiter, entered into a written contract with said Kopp, agreeing to sell the lot to him for $5,000, Kopp paying $250 down as earnest money, and agreeing to pay $2,750 within five days after the title should be examined and found good, provided a warranty deed conveying a good title should then be ready for delivery, and, for the balance, to give his note for $2,000, payable in one year, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, secured by a trust deed upon the property; an abstract of title to be furnished within a reasonable time, etc. Before December 27th, Edward Reiter had placed a sale board upon the lot, offering it for sale in his own name, and had also authorized the real estate firm of B. F. Cronkrite & Co. to place their sale board upon it. Reiter and Kopp were brought together by George E. Farley, an employé of Cronkrite & Co., at whose office the contract was drawn by Farley, and with whom the earnest money and the contract were left. On December 31, the abstract was delivered to Kopp. Within ten days thereafter, Kopp presented to Cronkrite & Co., as the only objection to the title raised by his attorney, a written memorandum suggesting that an affidavit be obtained showing the death of a party whose death was recited in a deed in the chain of title. On January 7, 1891, Farley drew up a warranty deed and a note and trust deed, as above specified. The warranty deed was executed on January 7th or 8th, by Mrs. Reiter and her husband, but was retained by the latter and never delivered; nor does it appear that it was ever approved by Kopp, or submitted to him or seen by him. The note and trust deed appear to have been thereafter executed by Kopp, but were never delivered to or received by Reiter, though he examined the original drafts before their execution. Reiter never obtained the required affidavits, and treated the objection to the title as trivial, claiming that it was made for delay only. Matters remained in this condition, Reiter calling at the office of Cronkrite & Co. several times to know why the money and note and trust deed were not ready, and Kopp calling to ask if the affidavit was obtained, until January 16, 1891, when the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Reiter was destroyed by fire. On the morning of January 17th, which was Saturday, Mrs. Reiter told her husband that she was tired of the delay, and that, unless the matter was closed that day, she would not allow the deed to be delivered. Accordingly he went, during the forenoon of that day, to the office of Cronkrite & Co., and demanded that the matter be closed. Farley at once telephoned to Kopp, who was at work in a bank, informing him of Reiter's presence and demand. Upon being told that the affidavit was not yet procured, Kopp answered that he would waive the production of the affidavit, as he was to receive a warranty deed, but could not leave the bank, and would not be able to pay the money until Monday, January 19th. When this answer was communicated by Farley to Reiter, the latter stated that the transaction must be completed on that day (Saturday), or not at all. On Monday, Kopp came to the office of Cronkrite & Co. to pay the money and exchange the papers, but was told that it was too late. On Wednesday, January 21st, he tendered to Mr. Reiter the $2,750 and the note and trust deed, and demanded the deed, but Reiter refused to deliver the deed, or to accept the money and securities. On January 21st, Kopp recorded a copy of the contract, and also the trust deed. Some days afterwards, Reiter destroyed the deed.

Messrs. George R. Grant and Charles E. Pope for appellant.

Messrs. Ashcraft & Gordon for appellee.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under the facts, did Mrs. Reiter, the owner of the lot, make any such contract for its sale and conveyance as a court of equity will compel her to perform? Section 2 of the Statute of Frauds provides as follows: "No action shall be brought to charge any person upon any contract for the sale of lands, etc., . . . unless such contract or some memorandum or note, thereof shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized in writing, signed by such party." 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. chap. 59, § 2, p. 1192. It cannot be contended here that there has been any such part performance of a parol contract by payments, possession, and improvements as will take the case out of the statute of frauds. The purchaser, Kopp, never took possession of the lot, nor made any improvements upon it. The only payment he made was that of the earnest money, $250. This amount, however, was not paid to Mrs. Reiter, but to Cronkrite & Co., who never had any authority from her, written or otherwise, to make sale of the lot, or to take any other steps in regard to it. We have held in a number of cases that, in order to ascertain what sort of writing is sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute as above quoted no form of language is necessary, if only the intention can be gathered, and that any kind of writing, from a solemn deed down to mere hasty notes or memoranda in books, papers, or letters, will suffice, but that the writings, notes, or memoranda must contain on their face, or by reference to others, the names of the parties, vendor and vendee, a sufficiently clear and explicit description of the property to render it capable of being identified from other property of like kind, together with the terms, conditions (if there be any), and price to be paid, or other consideration to be given; and such writing, note, or memorandum must be signed by the party to be charged, or, if signed by an agent, the authority of such agent must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged, and the contract or memorandum or note thereof made by the agent must also be in writing, and signed by him. McConnell v. Brillhart, 17 Ill. 354, 65 Am. Dec. 661; Cositt v. Hobbs, 56 Ill. 231; Wood v. Davis, 82 Ill. 811; Albertson v. Ashton, 102 Ill. 50; Chappell v. McKnight, 108 Ill. 570; Lasher v. Gardner, 124 Ill. 441. The only writing ever signed by Mrs. Reiter in this case was the warranty deed which she executed on or about January 7, 1891, and which remained in the hands of her husband, and was never delivered to Kopp, or to Vierling or Hammond. We do not think that this deed can be regarded, under the facts disclosed by the record, as such a memorandum or note of a contract for the sale of the land as is sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds. The contract of December 20, 1890, was executed by and between Mr. Reiter and the appellant, Kopp, but not by Mrs. Reiter, the owner of the lot. She gave her husband no written authority to act as her agent for the sale of the lot, or to sell it, or to sign any contract for the sale of it. We think that the findings of the master, to whom the cause was referred, and whose report was confirmed by the court below, are sustained by the evidence. He finds in his report that, before said contract was executed, Mrs. Reiter was not consulted about it, and did not consent to it, and did not even give her husband any parol authority to sell the lot. The testimony shows that she was opposed to selling the lot, and reluctantly executed the deed at the request of her husband. Although he informed her of the execution of the contract after he had signed it, yet it was never shown to her, and she never saw it until the hearing of the cause. The master has found, and the evidence shows, that the deed was not executed with reference to the previous written contract between Reiter and Kopp, but with the understanding that Mr. Reiter was to deliver it upon receiving $3,000 in money and a note and trust deed for $2,000. The deed simply purported to convey the premises from the grantors to the grantee for a consideration of $5,000, but it did not recite the terms of the contract, or in any manner refer to the contract. Counsel for appellant disclaim any reliance upon the undelivered deed as a conveyance of title, but contend that it is such written evidence of the contract of sale as satisfies the statute of frauds, whose object and meaning "is to reduce contracts to a certainty, in order to avoid perjury on the one hand (by the setting up of parol evidence, which is easily fabricated), and fraud on the other" (Welford v. Beasley, 8 Atk. 503); that the nondelivery of the deed, regarded as such written evidence, is immaterial; that it is immaterial whether Mrs. Reiter did, or did not, intend to charge herself thereby; and that the deed was an admission in writing of what the contract was. It is true that an undelivered deed is sometimes resorted to in order to help out the requirements of the statute of frauds, but it can hardly be said that the circumstances under which such a deed can be so used are disclosed by the facts in the present record. The language of the statute is, "some memorandum or note thereof." The word "thereof" refers back to the word "contract." There must be some memorandum or note in writing of the contract. Hence, if an undelivered deed executed by the owner can be regarded as meeting the requirements of the statute, it must be a memorandum or note of the contract, or in other words, must refer to the terms and conditions of the contract.

In Caggar v. Lansing, 43 N. Y. 550, it is said: "The counsel . . . insists that the deed executed by the intestate, and delivered in escrow, is a contract for the sale of the land executed by the intestate. This position cannot be sustained. The deed purports to be a conveyance of all the intestate's interest in the premises, for a consideration therein expressed of $1,000, but is wholly silent as to the terms of the contract pursuant to which it was made." In Campbell v. Thomas, 42 Wis. 437, 24 Am. Rep. 427, it was held that one who had deposited a deed with a third person, with directions to deliver it to the grantee on the happening of a certain event, but had made no valid executory contract to convey the land, could revoke the directions to the depository, and recall the deed at any time before the conditions of the deposit had been complied with, provided those conditions were such that the title did not pass at once to the grantee upon delivery of the deed to the depository; and it was there said: "If a person, who has made a parol agreement to sell land, sign an instrument in the form of a conveyance of such land to the vendee, and deposit it in escrow, if such instrument contains the terms of the parol agreement including the consideration, it is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the statute of frauds." In Swain v. Burnette, 89 Cal. 564, it was held that an undelivered deed, executed in pursuance of an oral agreement of sale, cannot be regarded as a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the statute of frauds, unless it is shown to have contained a memorandum of the oral agreement. Freeland v. Charnley, 80 Ind. 132; Parker v. Parker, 1 Gray, 409; Overman v. Kerr, 17 Iowa, 485; Cannon v. Cannon, 26 N. J. Eq. 316; Johnston v. Jones, 85 Ala. 286.

Many of the cases cited as authority for the position that a deed executed by an owner of land, but not delivered, is a sufficient memorandum of a contract of sale, under the statute, will thus be found, upon examination, to refer to deeds containing the terms of the contract. In the case at bar, however, as has already been stated, the deed executed by Mrs. Reiter and her husband was a simple conveyance of the lot for a consideration of

$5,000, and was silent as to the terms of the contract of December 27, 1890. Where the owner of land has signed a written contract of sale, or some writing amounting to such a contract, but has failed therein to properly describe the property, a deed executed by him, but not yet delivered, may be looked to as a part of the transaction, and may be made to aid the prior agreement, and secure its enforcement, by supplying the defect in such description. Thus, in Jenkins v. Harrison, 66 Ala. 345, to which reference is made by counsel for appellant, a memorandum in writing, purporting to contain the terms of a contract for the sale of land, and signed by both of the parties, failed to describe the property with the certainty and definiteness required to a specific performance, but deeds, inoperative for want of delivery, were executed by the parties a few days afterwards, which did correctly describe the land; and it was held that such undelivered deeds, and the memorandum signed by the parties, might, when taken together, satisfy the requisitions of the statute of frauds, the court saying: "When the memorandum . . . is taken and read, as it must be, in connection with the deeds subsequently executed, there is no doubt or uncertainty as to the terms of the contract for the sale of the lands. True, the deeds do not expressly refer to the memorandum, but they were all executed as parts of a single transaction, between the same parties, having reference to the same subject-matter." In Work v. Cowhick, 81 Ill. 817, property was struck off to appellant as the highest bidder at an administrator's sale, and the administrator's deed of the land, and a note signed by the purchaser, in which she promised to pay to the administrator the purchase money "for land purchased by Elizabeth Worth this day at administrator's sale," were left with a third person to be held until the purchaser should obtain personal security on the note, and execute a mortgage, at which time the deed was to be delivered. It was held, in a suit by the administrator against the purchaser for a failure to carry out the sale, that the making of the deed and the signing of the note might be regarded as one transaction, and that together they constituted such proof as amounted to a compliance with the statute of frauds; the description in the deed indicating what land was referred to by the imperfect description in the note. So, in Wood v. Davis, supra, written authority to an agent to sell land, and the terms of a contract of sale, were embodied in letters written by the owner, who also sent to the agent an executed deed to be delivered, but which was never in fact delivered, and when, after refusal by the agent to consummate the trade, suit for damages was brought by the purchaser against the owner, it was held that such a contract was established as took the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds, and that, although the memoranda contained no description of the land, the description in the undelivered deed could be referred to to supply the defect.

It is manifest, however, that all these cases differ from the case at bar. Here, the undelivered deed executed by Mrs. Reiter cannot be used to supplement, or supply any defect in, a prior contract of sale, or a prior note or memorandum of a contract of sale, because there was no prior contract or note or memorandum which she had signed, or to which she was a party, or which she had authorized to be made. The contract of sale, therefore, entered into, was made by Mr. Reiter, without either written or parol authority from her. Nor can her undelivered deed, subsequently destroyed, be regarded as a ratification of the agreement made by her husband, because it was not made in pursuance of that agreement, or to carry it out, but without any reference to it. Where, as is the case here, the owner of land, without making a valid executory contract to convey it, deposits a deed of it with a third person, to be delivered to the grantee upon certain terms, he may cancel the instructions given to such third person, and recall the deed, at any time before the specified terms have been complied with; nor can such deed, invalid as a conveyance for want of delivery, be considered as a memorandum in writing, signed by the owner, agreeing to convey the land therein described, so as to authorize a decree of specific performance. A deed which has not been delivered is not, by its own force, and aside from any contract to which it may be related, a sufficient writing to meet the requirements of the statute of frauds.

For these reasons we think that the decree of the Circuit Court was right, and the same is accordingly affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Re Henry GIBBS' ESTATE.

APPEAL OF W. F. HALSTEAD, Guardian of Mary E. Clapp and Henry Clapp.

(157 Pa. 59.)

1. A corporation is an artificial person created by law as the representative of those persons, natural or artificial, who contribute to or become holders of shares in the property intrusted to it for a common purpose.

2. A corporation de facto is an apparent corporate organization, asserted to be a corporation by its member and actually acting as such, but lacking the creative fiat of the law.

3. The foundation of a partnership is a contract expressed or implied. It results

NOTE.—Presumption as to incorporation.

1. In civil cases.

The exercise of corporate acts and user will not afford presumption of incorporation, there must be also a law or charter under which such corporation might be created. Methodist Episcopal Union Church v. Pickett, 19 N. Y. 488.

And user alone will not suffice to establish a cor-from the act of the parties, not from the act of the law.

4. The burden of proving that a bank was a partnership is on the one who asserts it, especially where the proof shows its organization under the name of the Home Savings Bank, with a president, cashier, and board of directors.

5. Proof that a person purchased shares in a bank, which was then organized and doing business, and received dividends declared by the directors and paid to him in a cashier's check, does not show any liability as a partner.

APPEAL by W. F. Halstead as guardian of Mary E. Clapp and Henry Clapp from a decree of the Orphan's Court for Bradford County dismissing exceptions to the report of an auditor appointed to settle the accounts of E. B. Gibbs, deceased, who disallowed a claim against such estate presented by appellant. Affirmed.

Henry Gibbs was a stockholder in the Home Savings Bank. W. F. Halstead, as guardian, was a depositor in said bank to the amount of $2,900.46. The bank failed and the guardian claimed to recover the amount of his deposit from the estate of Henry Gibbs on the ground that it was a partnership, and that, as one of the partners, Henry Gibbs was liable for the debts of the bank. From the auditor's report the following facts appear:

The exceptants to the account of the administrator ask to take out of the funds for distribution the sum of $36,167.58 and interest. This request is based on the position that the Home Savings Bank was not a corporation, or a limited partnership or a joint-stock association, and therefore was a common partnership. That, being a common partnership, and Henry Gibbs having been a stockholder therein, his individual estate is liable for the entire amount of money deposited in said bank during the time said Gibbs was a member thereof, and unpaid, with what interest may be due thereon.

The first question is, Have the exceptants proved this was a partnership, of which Henry Gibbs was a member at the time they deposited their money in this bank, and for all the debts and defalcations of which his estate is liable?

The evidence offered by them shows that in September, 1873, a bank was opened at South Waverly in this state; that it had over its door the name "The Home Savings Bank;" that it organized by electing a board of directors and a president and cashier; that its capital stock was divided into shares of one hundred dollars; that to each holder of stock it issued certificates of stock, saying upon their face that the poration, as people cannot create corporations merely by acting as such; there must be at least an organization under some existing charter or law. Welch v. Old Dominion Min. & R. Co. 81 N. Y. S. R. 916.

De Witt v. Hastings, 8 Jones & S. 463, holds this also, and that stock issue is not recognized as an act of user.

So acts of user alone will not establish a corporation in an action by a bank to recover money paid out by mistake on checks. United States Bank v. Stearns, 15 Wend. 814.

So transacting business by a president and secretary will not raise the presumption of incorporation. Clark v. Jones, 87 Ala. 474.

And issuing a policy of insurance, using the name "Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia," and having a president, secretary, and treasurer, will not raise the presumption of incorporation of an insurer where the premium note payable to an individual was claimed to belong to a foreign insurance corporation which had not complied with the laws of the state where suit was brought. Cunyus v. Guenther (Ala.) Nov. 2, 1892.

So an act of incorporation will not be presumed in an action against certain trustees, elders, and deacons of a church, sued individually on a contract under their seals, which does not show that the organization was incorporated. Ernst v. Bartle, 1 Johns. Cas. 319.

The exercise for years by the Yearly Meeting of Quakers of certain acts which are not such as corporations are alone competent and individuals incompetent to perform, will not authorize the presumption of incorporation so as to give power to take a devise. Greene v. Dennis, 6 Conn. 262, 16 Am. Dec. 58.

Orville & V. R. Co. v. Plumas County Supra, 87 Cal. 361, claims that there are no cases holding that no proof is required of the corporate existence of a plaintiff suing as a corporation except in states where the pleading waives that proof.

But the exercise of corporate acts and rights for 23 L. R. A.

many years will afford the presumption of incorporation where there is a charter. Selma & T. R. Co. v. Tipton, 5 Ala. 787, 39 Am. Dec. 844.

And the same applies where a school district claimed to have been organized under a general act. Robie v. Sedgwick, 36 Barb. 319.

And the same applies to a religious organization claiming a devise. Chittenden v. Chittenden (N. Y. Sup. Ct.) 1 Am. L. Reg. 538.

United States Bank v. Dandridge, 25 U. S. 13 Wheat. 70, 6 L. ed. 554, holds that a charter may be presumed to have been given to persons who have long acted as a corporation and assumed the exercise of the powers of a corporate body, although this question was not directly involved in the case.

Where the question occurs on pleadings, incorporation may sometimes be presumed. This, however, may arise from estoppel although not expressly given as a reason in such decisions.

As defendants alleged to be a corporation will be presumed to be incorporated, where they have recognized the corporate existence and acted as corporations. Tipton Fire Co. v. Barnheisel, 22 Ind. 88, 5 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 94.

So where the defendant is sued as a corporation and answers as such. Derrinbacher v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 21 Hun. 612, 59 How. Pr. 283.

It will be presumed on demurrer to a petition by the "Bennington Iron Company" that this is the name of an incorporated company having a right to sue in that name. Bennington Iron Co. v. Ruthertford, 18 N. J. L. 105, 35 Am. Dec. 523.

There being public and private statutes relating to the incorporation of trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Wisconsin it is presumed that trustees of such a church are incorporated where they sue as plaintiffs alleging that the society is "duly organized." Skinner v. Richardson, 76 Wis. 464.

So an association suing as a corporation, pursuing corporate forms of action, will be presumed to be incorporated under Cal. Civ. Code, § 358, providing that due incorporation claimed in good faith bank was organized under act of the legislature of Pennsylvania; that its authorized capital was $100,000; that these certificates had on their back blank powers of attorney for transfer, and in all respects were in the form and style usually adopted by banks; that these certificates when issued, were signed by the president and cashier, and to some of them the seal was affixed. It had a seal which was affixed to all cashier's checks; that said bank registered in the office of the auditor general, under section 1 of Act of June 7, 1879; that it filed these separate reports in said office of its net earnings or income under the 10th section of said Act; that it also filed in said office at least six reports for publication, covering the four quarters of the year in accordance with the requirements of the Act of April 16, 1850, and April 17, 1861; that it paid dividends to its stockholders; that it failed and passed into the hands of a receiver; that none of the certificates of stock, certificates of deposit, books of account with customers, bills, letters, checks or drafts bore upon their face the names of any member other than the president and cashier, and the person to whom addressed or issued; that the transfer of any stockholder's interest was at his own option, and neither such transfer nor the death of any stockholder worked any change in the name or conduct of the business; that so slight was the effect upon the business of the death of Mr. Gibbs, that a large amount of claims have been presented before the auditor for allowance, for money deposited after his death; or deposited before and re-deposited and new certificates therefor issued after his death. What is there in all this evidence from beginning of the business to the failure tending to prove a partnership? What in it all inconsistent with a corporate existence? Only one thing has been urged upon the auditor, and that is to be found in the form of the reports made by the bank to the auditor general of its net earnings or income under § 10 of Act 1879; and the position was taken that the provisions of this section only apply to unincorporated banks. While it is true that in the printed portion of these reports the word "firm" is used instead of "corporation," yet remembering that these printed forms were not made by the bank, but were sent to it from the auditor general's office; and that they were made and returned under an act which is not applicable solely to unincorporated banks, but applies to those which are incorporated as well, and as at most it was only the declaration of one member in the absence of and without the knowledge of any others, the auditor does not deem this single fact sufficient to overcome the preceding evidence of the incorporation, or, more accurately, to prove the partnership.

This comprises the affirmative evidence of the exponents. It is supplemented by some of a negative character, showing that searches in the office of the recorder of deeds in this county have failed to find any record of this bank as a limited partnership; and that searches in the auditor general's office have proved shall not be inquired into collaterally. Lakeside Ditch Co. v. Crane, 80 Cal. 181.

In an action against a railroad company to recover a statutory penalty allowed against any person obstructing a highway, it will be presumed that it is an incorporated company, and as such is allowed under another statute to cross highways, and no penalty is provided for the same. Cummins v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 115 Ind. 417.

And where plaintiffs claim that defendants are liable as partners and not as an incorporation the presumption will be against such claim, if plaintiff has the evidence relating thereto in his control in another state and fails to produce it. Hallstead v. Curtis, 18 L. R. A. 370, 143 Pa. 364.

2. In criminal cases.

In criminal prosecutions where the corporation is not a party but the question of incorporation arises incidentally, as in embezzlement, incorporation will be presumed from user and exercise of corporate privileges and acts. Calkins v. State, 18 Ohio St. 366, 98 Am. Dec. 121.

And the same was held in a prosecution for burglary. State v. Thompson, 28 Kan. 333, 33 Am. Rep. 165.

And for larceny. People v. Barrio, 49 Cal. 342; Braithwaite v. State, 28 Neb. 332; Smith v. State, 28 Ind. 322.

So in a prosecution for destroying a vessel with intent to injure the underwriters. United States v. Amedy, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 322, 6 L. ed. 502.

So in a prosecution for arson with intent to defraud the insurance company. People v. Hughes, 20 Cal. 237.

And for obtaining money from a corporation by false pretenses. Reg. v. Langton, L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 296.

So in forgery of draft on a corporation. People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507.

So in a prosecution for counterfeiting bank 22 L. R. A.

notes, or having in one's possession counterfeit notes on an incorporated bank. Reed v. State, 15 Ohio, 217; Sasser v. State, 13 Ohio, 453; People v. Chadwick, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 163; People v. Davis, 21 Wend. 309; People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645.

And in State v. Carr, 5 N. H. 397, it was held that in a prosecution for passing counterfeit money of a bank of another state it is sufficient to show that such a bank was chartered, and it is wholly immaterial whether the corporation had complied with the requisites of the charter or not.

And incorporation will be presumed from user and exercise of corporate privileges and acts, in a prosecution for stealing bank bills, but some evidence must be produced from which incorporation may be presumed. Johnson v. People, 4 Donio, 364; People v. Caryl, 12 Wend. 547.

And Jones v. State, 5 Sneed, 246, in a prosecution for counterfeiting required a copy of the bank charter to be produced, under Tennessee Penal Code, § 70, providing that a copy of a charter of a corporation legally authenticated should be shown in evidence of its existence.

And Stone v. State, 20 N. J. L. 401, holds that in a prosecution for having a blank unfinished note on an incorporated bank with intent to issue the same as genuine, strict proof of incorporation must be produced.

And in People v. Stearns, 21 Wend. 406, and State v. Calvin, R. M. Charit. (Ga.) 151, where the charge was forgery, the charter of the corporation was in fact proved.

But Brown v. State, 11 Ohio, 276, holds in a prosecution for acting as an officer of an unincorporated bank, that since all the laws incorporating banks in Ohio are public laws, the jury being supposed to know these laws may presume that the bank operated by the accused was not incorporated, if such was the fact, thus throwing the burden of proving it to be incorporated on the accused. I. T.

equally futile in finding any record of its incorporation. From these two negatives the auditor is urged to find an affirmative. In other words, as no record can be found showing this bank to have been a limited partnership or a corporation, it must have been a simple partnership.

Upon the certificates issued to Mr. Gibbs each time he acquired stock in this bank, it declared it was organized under "Act of the legislature of Pennsylvania." If this was true, a search among those local acts of the legislature which filled our pamphlet laws prior to 1874 might have been better rewarded.

But is it true that if this was not a corporation or a limited partnership it follows necessarily that it was a common partnership? This has been urged with much force, and the auditor admits that he entertained that belief at the outset of this case; but from authority consulted and reflection, he has come to a different conclusion. A partnership inter se cannot result from any aggregation of negatives. The formation of such a partnership is a positive action and cannot exist without an agreement of some kind among all its members. Parsons in his work on Partnership, in discussing who are liable as partners, says: "The first thing to be remembered is that persons may be charged as partners of a firm, on either one of two perfectly distinct grounds; one of them is that the person actually is a partner, the other is that he has with his own knowledge and consent held forth as a partner to the person having a claim, or to the public generally." Upon which of these two distinct grounds can Mr. Gibbs be charged as a partner in this case? Certainly not upon the first; for no articles of partnership and no agreement to be partners, and no agreement of any kind existed between Mr. Gibbs and the other stockholders; and no person can be a partner in fact in a partnership having no existence. If, then, this estate is to be charged, it must be upon the second ground above mentioned. But the evidence fails to show any holding forth of him as a partner by the bank or by himself. His name nowhere appears in any business transaction of the bank with others; he took no part in its management or control; he never held any official position therein; no one of these complainants knew that he was a stockholder therein at the time of depositing their money; the bank never represented to any one of them that it was a partnership, and none of them dealt with it as such, and the evidence does not show that Mr. Gibbs had any knowledge of the transactions between the bank and these claimants, or had a personal acquaintance with them. But on the contrary the weight of the evidence tends to show that this bank held itself out to the world and to Mr. Gibbs as a corporation and nothing else.

But, it is said, Mr. Gibbs took dividends on his stock, and hence his estate is liable in this case. As tending to discharge the burden resting upon the claimants, to prove that this bank was a partnership instead of a corporation, the fact of the receipt of dividends does not go far; because the taking of dividends is as consistent with the corporate, as with the partnership relation.

Nor does this fact standing alone and disconnected with any agreement between the stockholders, or any holding forth of Mr. Gibbs as a partner by the bank or by himself, or with any credit given to the bank by the claimants knowing Mr. Gibbs to be in any way connected therewith, make his estate liable in the opinion of the auditor.

Profits can only exist after payment of all liabilities; and how any one who shares only in what may remain after all creditors are secured, takes from them any security, is not quite plain. This is especially true of the banking business. Every man buying stock in a bank that is conducted upon usual and sound banking principles, as he has a right to expect it will be, knows that he will get no dividends, only such as may remain after all liabilities are deducted. When a person induces others to credit a firm upon the assurance or belief that he is a member thereof, his property should make good any loss thereby sustained by such creditor, whether such person receives any dividend or not; but to hold one who puts money into a business and draws out no part of the principal, and but a small part of the interest, liable for all debts, should rest upon better reason than that he has reduced the creditors' security. Mr. Gibbs' purchase of this stock and the receipt of dividends thereon, did nothing to lessen the amount these exceptants may or have realized on their claims. He put in $6,000, and drew out $1,820, thereby making the fund for creditors $4,180 larger. That this fund was diverted or misappropriated, does not make him liable; it not having been done by him or by any agent of his, in fact or in law. It has been said in support of these claims that there must be a liability somewhere, that persons doing business in this state must do it subject to the liability either of incorporators, partners, or individuals. Suppose this is admitted. Is there a want of all liability here? If this bank were solvent to-day, and these claimants brought suit against it as a corporation, what would prevent their recovery? Having declared to the world for nearly eighteen years that it was a corporation, and having induced these parties to trust it as such, what court would now permit it to defend on the ground that it was not incorporated, and thereby allow it to benefit by its own fraud?

Messrs. Willard, Warren & Knapp and Mercur & Mercur, for appellant:

Rightfully dividends can only be paid out of profits.

Profit is the excess of receipts over expense, but for the purpose of business, and of facilitating annual divisions of profits, a distinction is made between ordinary and extraordinary receipts and expenses; and whilst all extraordinary expenses are frequently defrayed out of capital, and out of money raised by borrowing, the ordinary expenses are defrayed out of the returns of the business; and the profits divisible in any year are ascertained by comparing the ordinary receipts with the ordinary expenses of that year.

It is shown by the reports that the Home Savings Bank did by its duly authorized officers, hold themselves out to the public that their business was a partnership.

The Home Savings Bank was therefore a joint stock company or a partnership.

According to Parsons, page 541, Collyer, page 1198, and Cook on Stock & Stockholders, section 508, it was a joint-stock company. We are inclined, however, to think, although it possess many of the elements of a joint-stock company, it is nearer a partnership.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves substantially the same question that was heard and determined in Hallstead v. Coleman, 143 Pa. 354, 13 L. R. A. 370. The appellant seeks to charge the estate of Henry Gibbs with money deposited by him, as guardian, in the Home Savings Bank, located at South Waverly, on the theory that the bank was a general partnership, and that the decedent was one of the partners. The appellees deny that the Home Savings Bank was a partnership, and assert that the decedent purchased shares of stock in the bank as and for the shares of stock in an incorporated bank, and not otherwise. At this point it seems desirable to define the words over which the contest extends.

First. What is a corporation? The several answers given by text-writers may be reduced to the following formula: A corporation is an artificial person created by law as the representative of those persons, natural or artificial, who contribute to, or become holders of shares in, the property intrusted to it for a common purpose. As it is the creature of positive law, its rights, powers, and duties are prescribed by the law. Beyond the legitimate purposes which it was created to serve, and the lines of limitation the law has drawn around it, it is without power to act or capacity to take. Thus a banking corporation, while fully competent to do what is usual and necessary in its own business, may not own and operate a railroad, or engage permanently in any other business than that for which it was created. It has neither the legal capacity nor the right to do so; and if it undertakes to go in any direction beyond its corporate powers its acts are ultra vires. The creation of a corporation is not within the power of the individuals who subscribe to its stock. It is exclusively the work of the law, and the best evidence of the existence of a corporation is the grant of corporate powers by the commonwealth.

Second. What is a corporation de facto? It is an apparent corporate organization, asserted to be a corporation by its members, and actually acting as such, but lacking the creative fiat of the law. In Taylor, Priv. Corp. 145, it is said that a de facto corporation may exist "when a body of men are acting as a corporation under color of apparent organization, in pursuance of some charter or enabling act." Their organization may be imperfect, so that upon a quo warranto they could not show a sufficient compliance with the law to justify the exercise of corporate powers, but as to parties dealing with them, and as to each other, they are estopped to deny that they are what they hold themselves out to be. In a recent case in Minnesota—Finnegan v. Knights of Labor Bldg. Assn., 51 Minn. —, 18 L. R. A. 778, — it was held that a de facto corporation exists when these three things concur, viz., a law under which the alleged corporation might be created, an attempt to organize under the law, an assumption and exercise of corporate powers under such attempted organization. In Methodist Episcopal Union Church v. Pickett, 19 N. Y. 482, only two things were held necessary, viz. "the existence of a charter or law under which a corporation with the powers assumed might be lawfully created, and a user by the party to the suit of the rights claimed to be conferred by such a charter or law." Where there has been a substantial compliance with the law, the corporation is, of course, de jure. Where there has been no substantial compliance, but there has been nevertheless an assumption and exercise of corporate powers in pursuance of an attempted organization, the alleged corporation is such de facto only. The Minnesota courts hold the correct rule, and three things are necessary to create the liability: A law or charter under which an organization de jure might be effected; an attempt to organize, which falls so far short of the requirements of the law or charter as to be ineffectual; an assumption and exercise of corporate powers notwithstanding the failure to comply with the law or charter.

Third. What is a partnership? Perhaps the best definition is that given by Story: A relation created by a "contract between two or more persons to place their money, effects, labor, or skill, or some or all of them, in lawful commerce, and divide the profits between them." Its foundation is a contract, express or implied. It results from the act of the parties, not from the act of the law. Hedge's App. 63 Pa. 273; 17 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 829. See also Modderell v. Keefer, 8 Watts & S. 63; Channel v. Fussitt, 16 Ohio, 166; Murray v. Bogert, 14 Johns. 818, 7 Am. Dec. 466; Phillips v. Phillips, 49 Ill. 437. But as to third parties one may be held liable as a partner by implication of law arising upon his own acts, contrary even to his own intention. Thus the officers and acting members of a corporation de facto may be liable as partners if their conduct has led others to trust the concern upon that basis. Stafford Nat. Bank v. Palmer, 47 Conn. 443. But without a contract of partnership, or such acts and declarations as lead others to infer its existence, and to extend credit on that basis, there is no foundation on which liability as a partner can rest. The best evidence of the existence of a partnership is the contract creating it. If proof of the contract is not within reach, its existence may be inferred from proof of contribution to the partnership stock. If direct proof of contribution cannot be had, it may be inferred from participation in profits. In the absence of all this, the acts and declarations of the parties sought to be charged may be resorted to. Participation in profits is not conclusive proof of the existence of the partnership relation (Edwards v. Tracy, 62 Pa. 374); but both in England and in this country it is cogent evidence upon the question. It puts the defendant upon his proofs explanatory of the fact. If he is able to show that such participation was referable to some other reason, such as compensation for services rendered by him as agent, broker, salesman, or otherwise, the prima facie is overcome. So, if the participation in the profits is referable to some other relation than that of partnership between the participants, such as membership in a joint-stock association or a corporation, the effect of proof of participation will be overcome.

In the light of these well-settled rules, let us consider briefly the position of the parties, and the important findings of fact made by the learned auditor in this case. The claimant's right to share in the fund in court rested on the theory that the Home Savings Bank, in which the money of his wards had been deposited, was a partnership, and that the decedent was a partner. The burden of proving the fact that the bank was a partnership was on him; and, as was said in Hallstead v. Coleman, 143 Pa. 354, 13 L. R. A. 370, "until that proof was given, the defendants were not called upon to enter upon their defense." The proof made upon this subject showed the organization of a bank under the name of the Home Savings Bank, with a president, cashier, and a board of directors. This is the mode of organization usually adopted by corporations, and did not tend to prove a partnership. It was then shown that the decedent bought and held certificates of stock in the bank, after its organization, which recited, not the formation of a partnership, but the organization of a bank under the laws of the state, and the division of its capital into shares of $100 each. This is not the usual way in which partnerships are created and partners admitted. It is the usual way in which stocks are issued and transferred in corporations. Proof was then made of the receipt by the decedent of several dividends upon his stock. These did not purport to be shares in the profits of firm business, but dividends, declared in the manner usual among corporations, upon the stock of the bank; and were paid by dividend checks drawn under the authority of a board of directors. The only other evidence was the returns made by the officers of the bank under the Tax Law of 1879, which threw very little light upon the character of the organization of the bank. Upon this proof the questions for the auditor were whether the bank was shown to be a partnership, and the decedent a partner. The bank did business for a number of years, and then failed. Its books and papers were in the hands, or subject to the control of, the receiver. The manner of its organization was not shown. The partnership agreement, if any such existed, was not produced. No proof was given that the officers or stockholders claimed or held out to the public that the stockholders were partners, or the bank a partnership enterprise. It was not alleged that the decedent participated in any manner in the business, or exercised any control over it. The whole case against him rested on the fact that he had purchased shares in a bank, then organized and doing business, and received dividends declared by the directors, and paid to him in a cashier's check. We are not surprised that the learned auditor was led to ask, "What is there in all this evidence, from the beginning of the business to the failure, tending to prove a partnership?" nor that he answered his own question by holding that this proof was insufficient to establish prima facie the existence of the partnership relation. On the other hand, there was much tending to show that Henry Gibbs understood that he was the holder of stock in an incorporated bank, and that the bank assumed and exercised corporate powers, and was dealt with by the public as a corporation. The form of its certificates, the manner of their transfer, the election of directors by the stockholders, the management of the business of the bank by the directors and the officers elected by them, the mode of declaring and paying dividends, were all suggestive of a corporation. They were not suggestive of a partnership. We are unable, therefore, to say that the auditor erred in finding that the bank was not shown to be a partnership. The learned judge who heard the exceptions to this report seems to have concurred with the auditor, and we require, under such circumstances, to be satisfied that a mistake was made before interfering with the findings. We are not so satisfied; but are of opinion that the state of the evidence justified the auditor's conclusion. This disposes of the whole case. It is said with earnestness and energy that this is a case in which the depositors deserve protection. We assent to this proposition. We can extend protection to them, however, in accordance with the established rules of law, and in no other manner. What the Home Savings Bank was in its organization, in what capacity those who held its stock were liable to its depositors, are questions not now before us. It may have been a corporation de jure, a corporation de facto, a joint-stock association, or a general partnership, so far as we are able to declare. What we say is that the evidence in this case is not sufficient to make a case, prima facie, against Henry Gibbs as a partner, or the bank as a general partnership. It does not appear that the bank was organized as a partnership, conducted business as a partnership, or held itself out to the public as such. It does not appear that Gibbs understood the bank to be other than what his certificates of stock indicated, or that he treated the business of the bank as that of a firm, or exercised the slightest control over or influence upon it, or misled the appellant or any other depositor by act or word as to his relation to it. What does appear is that he purchased shares of stock in the usual manner, and received some dividends thereon. These circumstances are naturally referable to the relation of a stockholder to a corporation; and, standing alone, are not proof, prima facie, of the appellant's proposition that the bank was organized as a partnership, and that the purchase of shares of stock made Gibbs a partner. If he had received profits from a business apparently conducted by a partnership, he would have been put upon his explanation, and, failing to make one, would have been held to be a partner. The burden in that case would have been on him. Having received dividends, declared by a board of directors upon the stock into which the capital of the bank was divided, he could rest securely upon the apparent character of the transaction and the inferences naturally to be drawn from it. The burden of explanation necessary to give another character to the dividend declared, and to the stock on which it was paid, was on him who asserted that such other was the true character of these circumstances.

It was also said in the argument that the recitals in the stock certificates are not evidence of actual incorporation as against a stranger. This must be granted. They do not prove incorporation; but the appellees are not bound, upon the evidence in this case, to prove incorporation. The significant question is, Where is the proof that this bank was organized or conducted as a partnership concern? The certificates do not prove that, but the inferences naturally drawn from them tend the other way. It will not do for the appellant to say: "We have shown that the decedent was a stockholder in this bank, and received dividends upon his stock. Now you must show that the bank was incorporated, or be liable to us as a general partner." This is attempting to change the burden of proof. Again, the learned counsel says: "This is the sole fact [the form of the certificate] that is before the court, and if it is sufficient to authorize a court to find an incorporation in this case, why is it not in any other?" The court below did not find that the bank was a corporation. That question was not before it. It was alleged by the appellant to be a partnership, but the auditor and the judge of the court below regarded the evidence in support of that allegation insufficient to justify a finding that the bank was not "organized by act of the legislature of Pennsylvania" as its certificates alleged, but by the parties as copartners. The appellant failed, not because the bank was held to be a corporation, but because it was not shown to be a partnership. Until evidence in support of the appellant's position is given sufficient to lead fairly to the conclusion that the bank was organized as a partnership, or that Henry Gibbs contracted to become a partner when he bought his stock, or that he led the public by his acts and declarations to deal with him or the bank on the basis of his being a partner, there is nothing that makes it the duty of his representatives to enter upon a defense, or that makes it possible for the court to decide upon the character of the bank. In such a state of the evidence the court can only say as the court below said in this case, "it is not shown that the bank is a partnership," and for that reason the claimant fails. The assignments of error are not sustained, and the decree is affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Eva T. ENGEL

v.

NEW YORK, PROVIDENCE & BOSTON
R. CO.

(.....Mass.....)

A railroad track owned, maintained, and repaired by a manufacturing company and used by a railroad company only under a license or invitation to deliver freight under a contract is not a part of the railroad company's "ways," within the meaning of Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 2, creating a liability for the death of an employé by reason of any defect in such ways.

(December 5, 1893.)

NOTE.—Liability of railroad company to employé for injuries received in the line of his duty from defective track not owned by the master.

This question seems to have arisen in very few cases. So far as the courts have passed upon the question they seem to agree that if the employer has practically made the track where the injury occurs its own it will be held responsible for its condition; as stated in the brief and dissenting opinion in ENGEL v. NEW YORK, PROVIDENCE & BOSTON R. CO.

In Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 46 Wis. 497, the court says that the authorities are quite uniform that one railroad track using the tracks of another for the purposes of its business should be responsible to passengers and owners of property by reason of the defective condition of such tracks, and further states that the same rule should apply between the railroad company and its employés.

So it has been held that it is no defense to a railroad R. A.

road company sued for an injury to a servant by reason of an unsafe track, that the track is owned by another company and only used by the employer under a contract which binds the owner to make repairs to be paid for jointly by the two companies. Smith v. Memphis & L. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 304.

So in a case where the employé was injured by a defect in the roadbed while attempting to couple cars, it was held that the fact that the track where an injury occurred did not belong to the master was no defense, if it negligently used the defective track. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cagle, 53 Ark. 347.

And it has been stated that where the employé of a railroad company is directed to use the road of another company in the business of his employer, he has the right to treat such road as the road of the company employing him; and every railroad company whose employés use the road of another company under its direction or for its benefit owes it as a duty to such employés to see that such road is not in a condition which will unneo-

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Worcester County which resulted in a verdict in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the death of defendant's employé because of an alleged defect in its way, within the provisions of Statute 1887, chap. 270, § 2. Judgment on the verdict.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Frank M. Forbush and John W. Keith, for plaintiff:

The wooden structure crossed the track at a height less than that required by the statute and did not have any guards as required by the statute.

Pub. Stat. chap. 112, §§ 120, 160.

The way was constructed and used for the special purpose of moving freight by the means of railway cars. Its operation was confined to the exclusive use of the defendant corporation. The defendant corporation received compensation for the transport of freight over this particular track in the same manner as for similar transport of freight over its main line or any other tracks operated and controlled by it.

In Com. v. Boston & L. R. Co., 126 Mass. 61, under circumstances far from presenting the strength of the plaintiff's contention in the case at bar, the court found the place of the accident to be upon a way operated and maintained by the defendant.

In Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 46 Wis. 497, Taylor, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The authorities are quite uniform, that where one railroad company uses the track of another company for the purpose of transporting passengers or property, the company transporting the persons or property is liable for any damages which may be sustained, either by the passenger or by the owners of the property so transported, caused by any defects in the road of the other company so used. . . . We are also of the opinion that the same rule should apply as between the railroad company and its employés."

This decision was upheld when the same case again came before the supreme court of Wisconsin in 49 Wis. 609.

The same doctrine is laid down in Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cagle, 53 Ark. 847.

See also Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Ross, 142 Ill. 9.

It may be observed that the machinery or plant, etc., need not be the property of the employer, the words of the act being apparently chosen so as to avoid this restriction.

Roberts & Wallace, Employer's Liability, 3d ed. p. 248.

In John v. Bacon, L. R. 5 C. P. 487, 39 L. J. C. P. 865, the defendant was held liable for the state of a hulk belonging to a third person, which he was allowed to use for his own purposes, on the ground that it was under his control, and that he had invited the plaintiff to come on board it.

Mr. William A. Gile, for defendant:

The provision of Pub. Stat., chap. 112, § 120, is as follows: "If the railroad is constructed to pass under the way—no bridge for any purpose shall be 'constructed over a railroad at a height less than eighteen feet above the track of said railroad, except by consent in writing of the board.'"

This section must be held to mean the way referred to in the preceding or 119th section, which is a "highway or other way," and it has been held this does not include a private way.

See Boston Gas Light Co. v. Old Colony & N. R. Co., 14 Allen, 444.

The fact that the defendants used the track of the Washburn & Moen Manufacturing Company for the purpose of receiving and discharging the freight of that manufacturing company does not make that track a part of the ways, works, and machinery within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act.

The "ways, works, and machinery" for which an employer can be held responsible must be "something provided by the employer."

Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 155 Mass. 21.

Where there was a defective track used by one corporation over which it has no control, said track does not by the occasional or frequent use of said track render the corporation using said track liable for its defects as a part of their ways, works, and machinery.

Trask v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 298.

Knowledge of a defect and appreciation of the danger by an employé is a defense under the Employers' Liability Act.

essarily endanger their lives or limbs. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Ross, 142 Ill. 9.

If private parties owning a spur track have allowed it to be and remain out of repair and in a dangerous condition for use for railroad purposes, a railroad company voluntarily running its trains upon it is responsible for injuries to its employés by reason of the defective condition of the track, although the trains were running carefully and slowly, and it is immaterial that a state statute requires the delivery of goods at their destination over the tracks not belonging to the carrier. Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 49 Wis. 609.

A distinction was made in Trask v. Old Colony R. Co., 156 Mass. 298, which seems to have been developed somewhat more fully in ENGEL v. NEW YORK, PROVIDENCE & BOSTON R. CO.

In Trask v. Old Colony R. Co., 156 Mass. 298, it was held that while it may not be necessary to render the employer liable for injury to the employé 22 L. R. A.

that the track should belong to him, yet it should at least appear that he has control of it and that it is used in his business by his authority, express or implied, and it was therefore held that the mere fact that the employer in exchanging cars with another company occasionally runs its engines on to the latter's track will not render it liable for injuries to the employé, if the employer has no control over the track so used.

Another distinction is that a railroad company sending its locomotive engineer (employed by the month) with one of its engines to haul temporarily for another company the trains of the latter over the line of such latter company, is not responsible to the engineer for the bad condition of the track nor for the want of adaptation of the engine to the track, it not being alleged that the employer company knew of such bad condition or want of adaptation, and concealed its information. Dunlap v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 81 Ga. 138. H. P. F.

O'Maley v. South Boston Gas Light Co. 158 Mass. 185.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought under Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 2,* to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate through an alleged defect in the condition of the defendant's ways. The question is whether the cause of the accident is within the statute. The deceased was killed by being knocked off a car of the defendant by a slanting bridge or chute over the track between two buildings of the Washburn & Moen Manufacturing Company, in that company's yard. The track was that company's track, owned, maintained, and repaired by it, the bridge of course was its bridge, and the defendant came on the track only as licensee or invited under a contract by which the defendant delivered freight in the Washburn & Moen Company's yard on certain terms. A majority of the court are of opinion that the track was no part of the defendant's ways, within the meaning of the statute.

We could not come to a different result without repudiating the reasoning of Trask v. Old Colony R. Co., 156 Mass. 298, 304, and the tests sanctioned by that case and by Coffey v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 155 Mass. 21, 28. See also Regan v. Donovan, 159 Mass. 1. The track is not provided by the defendant, or subject to its control. In the language of Roberts & Wallace (Employer's Liability, 3d ed. 249), the defendant had not adopted it as its own. We are not dissatisfied with these tests, and we think that neither the language of the statute nor good sense would permit us to hold an employer liable under the act for defects which he cannot help, in a place out of his control, to which his employés once in a while may be called for a few minutes. It will be understood that our view by no means requires ownership as a condition of the defendant's liability.

The words of the act are, "which arose from or had not been discovered or remedied owing to the negligence of the employer or of any person in the service of the employer and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways . . . were in proper condition." These words mean that the defect must be one which the employer has a right to remedy if he does discover it, and of a kind which it is possible to charge a servant with the duty of setting right. They cannot be made clearer by discussing the principles of common-law liability, or by referring to decisions upon a wholly different kind of statute, like Com. v. Boston & L. R. Co., 126 Mass. 61.

Our decision may not leave the plaintiff remediless. If there was a defect, it is pos-

Judgment on the verdict.

Knowlton, J., dissenting:

The opinion of the majority of the court puts upon an important clause of the Employers' Liability Act a construction which seems to me wrong. The track on which the plaintiff's intestate was killed was of the same kind, and used by the defendant in the same way, as ordinary side tracks constructed for the delivery of freight to manufacturing companies having works near the line of a railroad. It was used by the defendant in the transportation of freight for hire. Freight carried over the defendant's railroad was received and delivered at the works of the Washburn & Moen Manufacturing Company without extra charge, the price paid for transportation to and from other stations including the transportation over this track. Freight sent away by other railroads or received from them was carried over this track by the defendant for a stipulated price paid by the Washburn & Moen Manufacturing Company. There can be no doubt that if the defendant had owned the track it would have been a part of its ways and works, within the meaning of the statute. Is such a track any the less a part of the ways and works of a railroad company, as between the company and its employés, if it is hired from a third party, or furnished for use by the owner of the freight? If it is owned and kept in repair by the freight owner, that fact presumably is taken into account in fixing the terms on which the freight is carried, and its use by the carrier in his business is in that way paid for by the carrier as much as if it were hired from a third party. The statute is intended to define the rights and liabilities of employer and employé. The question what constitutes the ways, works, or machinery is a question which arises only between employer and employé, and should be answered in such a way as to give effect to the meaning of the statute. The employé finds a track of this kind used like other side tracks belonging to the corporation, adapted to the convenient transaction of its freighting business. Ordinarily, he has no means of knowing whether the track is owned and maintained by the railroad corporation or by the manufacturer whose freight is brought over it. All he can see or know is that it is connected with, and used in, the business of the corporation in delivering freight. Whether an additional price is paid for the transportation of its cars or of the cars of other railroads over that track he does not know, nor is it important for him to know. It is a place specially fitted for the work of his employer, on which his employer sets him at work, and in which the employer presumably has rights for the time being. It ought to make no difference under the statute how the employer procures the ways, works, or machinery connected with and used in his business, or by what kind of title he holds them. So long as they are connected with his business, and used in it, it is his duty to have them safe, so that his employes may not be unnecessarily exposed to danger. If another owns and furnishes them, and agrees to keep them safe, it is his duty, as between him and his employé, to see that the owner properly does what he agrees to do.

It is a general rule at the common law that a railroad corporation is liable for an injury to a passenger, or for loss of freight, arising from a defect in a track of another corporation over which it runs its cars, as if it owned the track. As between the two corporations, the only duty to maintain the track in repair under their contract may be upon the owner of the road, but, as between the first-mentioned corporation and a passenger or owner of freight, it is the duty of the carrier to have the track safe, whether it owns it or hires it. McElroy v. Nashua & L. R. Corp. 4 Cush. 400, 50 Am. Dec. 794; McCluer v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 13 Gray, 124, 74 Am. Dec. 624; Feital v. Middlesex R. Co. 109 Mass. 398, 12 Am. Rep. 720; Murch v. Concord R. Corp. 29 N. H. 9, 61 Am. Dec. 631; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Peyton, 106 Ill. 534, 46 Am. Rep. 705; 2 Redf. Railroads, 4th ed. § 204. See also Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Barron, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 90, 18 L. ed. 591; Sprague v. Smith, 29 Vt. 421, 70 Am. Dec. 424; Webb v. Portland & K. R. Co. 57 Me. 117, 128.

The duty of a railroad corporation to furnish for its employes safe tracks, cars, locomotive engines, and other machinery, tools, and appliances with which its business is to be carried on, is similar in kind to its duty to passengers in these respects, although the degree of care required is less. In either case its duty is the same when the tracks, cars, and engines are hired or used under a license from others, as when they are owned by the employer. Spaulding v. W. N. Flynt Granite Co. (Mass.) 34 N. E. Rep. 1134; Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Ross, 142 Ill. 9; Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 46 Wis. 497, 49 Wis. 609; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Cagle, 53 Ark. 347; Smith v. Memphis & L. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 304. In Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 46 Wis. 497, the facts were similar to those in the case at bar. An ice company laid and maintained a track to its icehouse, which was used by the defendant corporation in taking cars to and from the icehouse at the request of the company. The plaintiff was injured while assisting in the work of transporting the cars, and the defendant was held liable to its employé for the defective condition of the track, which the ice company ought to have kept in repair. The court says in the opinion: "The authorities are quite uniform, that where one railroad company uses the track of another company for the purpose of transporting passengers or property, the company transporting the persons or property is liable for any damages which may be sustained, either by the passengers or by the owners of the property so transported, caused by any defects in the road of the other company so used. . . . We are also of the opinion that the same rule should apply as between the railroad company and its employes. . . . In 23 L. R. A.

the case at bar there would seem to be every reason for holding that the same rule should apply. The company, when the accident happened, was running its trains over a short line of road, which terminated at the main track of its road, which was never used as a railroad for any purpose except as the trains of the defendant ran over it, and for all practical purposes was of no use as a railroad except as used by the defendant. . . . He was directed by the proper agents of the defendant to assist in running its cars and engines over it. As between itself and its employes, who were directed to use the road in the business of the defendant company, such employes have the right to treat the road as the company's road, and the company, as to its employes was bound to see that such road, whilst so used for its benefit by its employes, was in such condition as not to unnecessarily endanger their lives or limbs." I am of opinion that a railroad company is liable for an injury to its employé in such a case at the common law, and the reason for holding it liable seems to me equally applicable to the clause of the Employers' Liability Act under which this action is brought. Indeed, there is an additional reason for giving such a construction to this clause in the language which in terms includes not only the ways, works, and machinery that belong to the employer in the ordinary sense, but those which he permits to be used in his business. See also Stat. 1893, chap. 359.

In determining whether he was negligent in not discovering or remedying the defect, of course the fact that another primarily has the duty of keeping the works in a safe condition is important, for then he is only required to use reasonable care and supervision to see that this duty has been done. To that extent, under his contract with the owner, he has a right in the track and a kind of control of it. In Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 155 Mass. 21, 23, a case arising under this statute, Mr. Justice Allen says, in giving the opinion of the court: "The want of ownership by the defendant is not of much significance; but by the terms 'ways, works, or machinery connected with or used in the business of the employer,' we understand something in the place, or means, appliances, or instrumentalities provided by the employer, for doing or carrying on the work which is to be done." Was not the track in the present case something in the place, or means, appliances, or instrumentalities provided for the employé by the employer for carrying on the work which the employé was hired to do? In the recent case of Spaulding v. W. N. Flynt Granite Co. (Mass.) 34 N. E. Rep. 1134, an action at common law, it was held that the defendant was liable for the defective condition of a borrowed car as if it had owned the car; and Mr. Justice Holmes, in giving the opinion, refers to Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., supra, in such a way as plainly to imply that in this respect the same rule applies to cases under the Employers' Liability Act as to those at the common law. The language of the opinion in Trask v. Old Colony R. Co., 156 Mass. 293, should be read in its application to the facts.

In that case the arrangements of the two roads called for a delivery of cars by one road at the terminus of its line, and the reception of them by the other at the same point at the terminus of its line, and in the transaction of its regular business neither company had any contract or arrangement to use the line of the other. Neither road was obliged, under its contract, to go upon the tracks of the other, and neither was under any obligation to keep its tracks in repair for the use of the other. The passage of a car or engine beyond the terminus of the road then running it was not in the nature of a regular, authorized use of the track of another corporation in its business, and the track was in no proper sense connected with or used in its business. There was rather an occasional, and almost accidental, running of its engines or cars beyond its own track in doing a business, the regular prosecution of which did not extend beyond its own line. The defendant had no control nor right of control, nor right to demand a safe condition of the track of the other railroad. But in the present case the track is furnished to the defendant as a place on which to do its regular business for pay, and the defendant has the control of it in the sense that it has a right to insist on its being kept in a safe condition for the transaction of the business which it has agreed to do.

The doctrine contended for by the defendant, as I understand it, comes to this: If a manufacturer, instead of owning the ways, works, and machinery necessary to be used in his business, arranges with another person who owns a manufacturing establishment to furnish it for his use, and to keep it constantly in good condition, and if one of his employes is instantly killed, by a defect negligently suffered to be in the ways, works, or machinery which he is using under this arrangement, he will not be liable under the statute because the ways, works, and machinery are not his. The owner will not be liable under the statute, for he is a stranger to the manufacturing business carried on there, and the person killed is not his employé. Neither the employer nor the owner of the establishment will be liable at the common law, for the common law permits no recovery for a death resulting from negligence. The widow and children of the deceased employé will therefore be left remediless. It seems to me that such a construction of the statute tends to defeat the purpose of the legislature. In the present case the deceased brakeman was not an employé of the Washburn & Moen Manufacturing Company, and in my view of the law the plaintiff can have no remedy against that corporation.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

E. C. NEUFELDER, Assignee, etc., of C. H. Knox, Appt.,
v.

GERMAN AMERICAN INSURANCE CO., Resp't.

(6 Wash. 386.)

1. A foreign corporation may be charged as garnishee in all cases where an original action might be maintained against it for the recovery of the property or credit in respect to which the garnishment is served.

2. A fund kept by a foreign insurance company in one state for the payment of losses in that and another state, is subject to garnishment at the instance of creditors of an insured in the latter state to the amount of the debt of the company for a loss upon a policy issued in the latter state, although no portion of such fund has been specifically appropriated to such loss, under a statute providing that any credit or other personal property in the possession or under the control of any person, or debts owing the defendant, may be attached.

(May 10, 1893.)

NOTE.—The status of a debt for the purpose of garnishment, which is a matter of much importance and much doubt in the law, is here held as in many prior cases to be at the residence of the debtor. The same is held in the recent Wisconsin case of Bragg v. Gaynor, 21 L. R. A. 161, and is recognized in Douglass v. Phenix Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 118. But vigorous opinions to the contrary have been expressed in other jurisdictions as shown by the note to Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Smith 29 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Strudwick, Peters & Van Wyck, for appellant:

There is a distinction between process to subject tangible property of the defendant, in the hands of a garnishee, to the payment of a debt, and process to enforce the payment of a debt due from the garnishee to the defendant.

Boisford v. Simmons, 32 Mich. 352.

The California court in said attachment proceedings did not acquire any jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, and there being no property of defendant in that state, at that time, its proceedings were void as against the plaintiff, and constitute no bar to this action.

A policy of insurance is a chose in action, i. e.: "a right of proceeding in a court of law to procure the payment of a sum of money." 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 235.

It is therefore personal property.

Knox is, and at all times has been, a nonresi-

(Miss.) 19 L. R. A. 577. The only hope of uniformity in the law on this subject must rest on the federal courts, and probably could be reached only by deciding that garnishment of a debt due to a nonresident without any service on him is not due process of law. It seems difficult to justify a proceeding which condemns or appropriates a debt without notice to the creditor or opportunity to protect his property right therein.

See also 23 L. R. A. 445, 650; 27 L. R. A. 651; 30 L. R. A. 364; 36 L. R. A. 549, 640; 40 L. R. A. 237; 41 L. R. A. 331; 42 L. R. A. 283; 44 L. R. A. 101; 45 L. R. A. 257; 48 L. R. A. 452.

dent of California, and a resident of Washington, and no personal service of process of the California court was ever made upon him, but the service of process in the attachment cases was made upon him by publication in a newspaper, and by mailing a copy of the summons to said Knox, and said Knox never appeared in said actions. Any personal judgment therefore rendered by the California court against said Knox must be invalid.

Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565.

In proceedings against one as garnishee, it is necessary that both the person sought to be charged and the property in his hands, which is the subject of the attachment, be brought within the jurisdiction of the court.

Co.* 45 Wis. 172; Carpenter v. Tatro, 86 Wis. 298; Morgan v. Neville, 74 Pa. 52; Wright v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 19 Neb. 175, 56 Am. Rep. 747.

Unless this is done, the proceedings are void. Drake, Attachm. 6th ed. §§ 87a, 87b, 692, 698, 711 (5).

There is a distinction between movables, that is visible, tangible personal property, and debts choses in action, like the right to recover upon a policy of insurance.

Guillander v. Howell, 85 N. Y. 662.

A chose in action cannot be said to have any situs in the place where the debtor resides; as a general principle it is payable at the residence of the creditor.

Ibid.

On the contrary, so far as it has a situs, the highest authorities hold that the domicil of the creditor decides and controls the situs of the debt.

Whart. Conf. L. § 868; Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, 25 L. ed. 558; Keyser v. Rice, 47 Md. 211, 28 Am. Rep. 448.

The situs of this debt must be controlled and fixed by one or more of the following considerations:

1. The lex loci contractus.
2. The domicil of the debtor.
3. The place of payment of the debt.
4. The domicil of the creditor.

The lex loci rei sita has no application to this discussion because that doctrine seems to apply only to visible, tangible chattels, and not to choses in action.

Guillander v. Howell, supra.

I. This contract was made and entered into by the defendant outside of the jurisdiction of the courts of the state of California, and within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state of Washington.

II. Mr. Wharton in his Conflict of Laws, section 361 (2) says: "Because the debtor's domicil is the place of payment it has no necessary connection with the terms of the debt. It may be that in jurisdictions where debtors are only suable in their domicil it may be supposed to give the applicatory law. It is not so where debtors are suable wherever they can be found."

The domicil of this debtor, insurance company, so far as this contract evidenced by this policy of insurance is concerned, and for all the purposes of this action, was and is the state of Washington.

The general rule that the situs of a debt is at the domicil of the debtor, has an exception in the case of debts due by a corporation chartered in one state and doing business in another under the laws of the latter. When such corporation, by the laws of the latter state has property there and an agent to accept service and can be compelled by judicial process to pay its debts there, that is its domicil as to debts payable in said state.

Brantley, Pers. Prop. § 819; New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Woodworth, 111 U. S. 188, 38 L. ed. 879.

III. Said policy of insurance provided that said policy, at the execution thereof by said corporation, through its president and secretary, would not be valid unless countersigned by its duly authorized agent at the city of Seattle. This provision of the policy made the debt thereby evidenced, in case of loss, payable at Seattle.

May, Ins. 2d ed. § 66; Whart. Conf. L. § 899; Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 551.

IV. The weight of authority seems to be conclusive that the domicil of the creditor controls the situs of the debt.

This debt, in the absence of personal service upon the assured C. H. Knox was not subject to the process of the California courts, unless the debt was payable within that state.

The proceeding in the California court was a proceeding in rem.

8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 1103 (6); Drake, Attachm. 6th ed. § 452.

Whether a person is liable to garnishment in a state, other than that of his residence, is a question of jurisdiction.

8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 1129.

The process of the courts of a state is limited in its operation by state lines.

Ibid.; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565.

By reason of the contract which the defendant chose to make in this state, payable in this state, after having complied with the statutes of this state in such case made and provided, as a condition precedent to obtaining the permission of this sovereignty to do business within its limits (such conditions being imposed); the defendant, insurance company became domiciled in this state for the purposes of all debts contracted here and payable here; then

It must have been a nonresident of the state of California for all purposes connected with this action, and the situs of the debt it owes upon this policy of insurance, was and is in the state of Washington, and not elsewhere.

7 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 8595.

Messrs. Stratton, Lewis & Gilman, for respondent:

Under the California statutes the process to subject tangible property of a defendant in the hands of a garnishee does not differ from process to enforce payment of a debt due from a garnishee to a defendant.

Deering, Cal. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542-544.

The defendant was a New York corporation; but, so far as concerns its Pacific coast business, its home was in San Francisco. San Francisco was its domicile.

The courts of a state have jurisdiction, for purposes of garnishment, over foreign corporations doing business within their jurisdiction.

Anders, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the appellant to recover from the respondent the sum of $1,000, alleged to be due upon a policy of fire insurance issued by the respondent to one C. H. Knox, the assignor of the appellant. The respondent is a corporation incorporated and existing under the laws of the state of New York, and at the time of issuing the policy under consideration was lawfully authorized to transact business in this state. It also carried on business in Oregon, California, and other states and territories on the Pacific coast, and had a general agent for the management of its business in all of said states and territories, including Washington, whose office was at San Francisco, in the state of California. Its funds for the payment of losses were kept by this general agent or manager at San Francisco, and disbursed by him as occasion required; the local agents in the several states having no authority to pay or settle for losses, except by his special instructions. On September 11, 1890, the respondent issued a policy of insurance, whereby it insured C. H. Knox against loss or damage by fire, to the amount of $1,000, on a stock of merchandise belonging to him, or in which he was interested, in Seattle, from the 11th day of September, 1890, to the 11th day of September, 1891, which policy was duly executed by the respondent through its president and secretary in the state of New York, and countersigned by its duly authorized agent in the city of Seattle, and by said agent there delivered to said Knox. On the 19th day of September, 1890, the property so insured was destroyed by fire, and the loss was duly adjusted at the sum of $1,000. On the 25th day of October, 1890, the assured made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors, in accordance with the insolvency laws of this state, to the appellant, who accepted the trust, and duly qualified as assignee. After the loss occurred, and prior to the assignment of Knox to the appellant, certain creditors of Knox, residing in San Francisco, commenced actions in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to recover the amounts due them, and caused the debt due from the respondent to Knox upon the insurance policy to be attached, in accordance with the laws of California, by delivering a copy of the writs of attachment to one Grant, the general agent of the company, together with a notice that the debt owing by respondent to the said Knox was attached in pursuance of said writs. The respondent admits its liability on the policy upon which this action was brought, and does not seek to evade the payment of the sum due, but contends that the levy of the garnishment process in California prior to the time of the assignment to the appellant is a bar to this action. Knox is a resident of this state, and no personal service was made upon him, nor did he enter an appearance in either of the actions in the state of California in which the attachments were levied. The service of summons was made by publication, in the manner, and for the length of time, provided by the laws of California. Upon the facts found, concerning which there is no controversy, the court below entered judgment in favor of the respondent, and the question for our determination on this appeal is whether or not the court committed error in so doing.

It is contended by the appellant that the California court never obtained jurisdiction of the debt owing by the respondent to Knox, because the situs of the debt was either at the domicile of the creditor or at the domicile of the debtor, and in either event was not within the jurisdiction of the court; and the argument is that the claim of Knox against the insurance company is personal property, and as such follows the person of the owner, but that, if its situs was at the domicile of the debtor, still it was in this state, and not in California, for the reason that the policy of insurance was executed here, by a company doing business here, and whose domicile was therefore here, for all purposes connected therewith, and especially for the purpose of suit upon the contract. It is conceded by the respondent that by establishing agencies and doing business here, and appointing an agent upon whom service of process should be made, as required by our statute, it became amenable to all the laws of this state concerning foreign corporations, including the liability to be sued for the enforcement of its obligations; and it is not contended by the respondent that the proceedings in the California court are entitled to any faith or credit here, if that court had not jurisdiction of the respondent, and of the debt attempted to be garnished there. It is well settled that if a court has neither jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, nor of his property, it has nothing before it upon which it can adjudicate, and that any judgment it may render under such circumstances is of no validity whatever. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565. But it is not necessary, in order that a valid judgment may be rendered, that both the person and the property of the defendant be within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. If property is attached, and the defendant is not personally served, and does not appear, and publication of the summons is duly and regularly made, the court has jurisdiction to render a judgment personal in form, but which affects only what is attached. But such judgment will not authorize an execution against any other property, nor can it be made the basis of an action against the defendant. Drake, Attachm. 7th ed. § 5; Cooper v. Reynolds, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 808, 19 L. ed. 981.

The first inquiry, therefore, is, Was the property of Knox attached by the service of the writ and notice upon the respondent at San Francisco? And, there being no question as to the regularity of the garnishment proceedings, the answer must depend upon whether or not the respondent, and the debt owing by it to the attachment defendant, were within the jurisdiction of the court. There is no question but what the money to pay the debt was in the possession of the respondent at San Francisco, although the particular sum required had not been set apart for that purpose prior to the service of the garnishment process. The laws of California provide that any credit or other personal property in the possession or under the control of any person, or debts owing to the defendant, may be attached in the manner therein prescribed. See Deering, Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542-544. And under such a statute there is no doubt that a resident may be charged as garnishee in respect of a debt he owes to a nonresident. But a nonresident is not subject to garnishment, unless, when garnished, he have, in the state where the action is pending and the attachment is obtained, property of the defendant under his control, or he be bound to pay the defendant money, or to deliver to him goods, at some particular place in that state. Hawes, Jurisdiction of Courts, § 253; Drake, Attachm. 7th ed. § 474, and cases cited. But it is claimed by the learned counsel for the appellant that this rule is not applicable in this case, for the reason, as already stated, that the respondent cannot be deemed to have a domicile other than in this state, in respect of business transacted here, and for the further reason that the debt sought to be attached is, and always has been, at the domicile of the creditor in this state. As to the validity of the policy of insurance, if that were in issue, we should say that the contract should be interpreted by the laws of this state. 1 May, Ins. § 66; Whart. Conf. L. § 399; 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 551. But we are not prepared to say that it can only be enforced in our own courts. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that the assured himself might have brought an action on his policy in California, or in any other state where the insurance company could be legally served with process. It is no part or ingredient of the contract of insurance that it shall be enforced only in conformity to the law of the place where it is executed. Griswold v. Union Mut. Ins. Co., 3 Blatchf. 281. And as, in this instance, Knox could have collected his claim against the respondent in the courts of California, it follows that his creditors there had the same right to collect it by process of garnishment, and to apply the proceeds in satisfaction of their demands against him. In fact, garnishment, while in the nature of a proceeding in rem, is, in effect, an action by the defendant, in the plaintiff's name, against the garnishee, the purpose and the result of which are to subrogate the plaintiff to the rights of the defendant against the garnishee. Drake, Attachm. 7th ed. § 452. As to the liability of foreign corporations to garnishment, we think the law is correctly summarized in 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 1181, as follows: "Except, therefore, in those states where it is held that corporations are in no event subject to garnishment, a foreign corporation may be charged as garnishee in all cases where an original action might be maintained against it for the recovery of the property or credit in respect to which the garnishment is served." Although the situs of intangible personal property may be at the domicile of the creditor for the purpose of taxation or distribution, yet for the purpose of collection a debt is ambulatory, and accompanies the person of the debtor. We think this debt was properly attached in California; and, that being so, the attachment proceedings there constitute a defense to this action. Embree v. Hanna, 5 Johns. 101; Wheeler v. Riyom, 8 Cow. 815, note a; Andreus v. Herriot, 4 Cow. 521; Dittenhoefer v. Cœur d'Alene Clothing Co. 4 Wash. 519.

In the case last above cited, this court held that where a foreign corporation does business in this state, under the laws prescribed by our legislature, and has an attorney appointed, upon whom service in any proceedings in the courts in this state may be made, it thereby becomes subject to garnishment here. We have no doubt of the correctness of that decision, and are therefore bound to recognize the doctrine therein enunciated, when affirmed by courts in other states, which, like California, have statutes substantially like our own.

The further point is made by the appellant that the plaintiffs in the attachment suits, by filing their claims with the assignee (appellant), thereby abandoned any rights they may have had under the attachments. If the objection is at all available, it is certainly not applicable to the action of Isadore Leviere, in which the amount sued for was $2,439.21, and was made up of various assigned claims, only one of which was filed with the assignee in this state, and that only for the sum of $279.92. The remaining attaching creditors cannot be affected by the action of those who filed their claims, and, as the amount claimed is largely in excess of the debt attached, the result would be the same to the appellant, even if we should adopt the rule of law contended for by him.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

TRINITY COLLEGE, Appt.,

v.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE CO., of Hartford, Conn.

(..... N. C.)

1. A life insurance policy constitutes a wagering contract, in the absence of any ties of blood or marriage, between the beneficiary and the person whose life is insured, or of some contractual relation between them by reason of which damage may result to the beneficiary from the death of the other party.
2. A college supported by a church has no insurable interest in the life of a member of that church which will sustain a policy of insurance on his life in favor of the college, although the college paid the premiums, while the application was made by the person whose life was insured.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Durham County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the surrender value of a policy of insurance on the life of Edward Samuel Sheppe, in which plaintiff was the beneficiary. Affirmed.

The complaint set out that in 1898, Edward Samuel Sheppe of Durham, N. C., applied to the defendant for a policy of life insurance for $1,250 upon his own life for the benefit of Trinity College, a corporation sustained and controlled by the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of which church the applicant was a member. Plaintiff paid the premium and the policy was issued to it. The policy provided for cash surrender values according to the number of premiums which had been paid. Plaintiff notified the company of its intention to take such value and surrender its policy, demanding the amount thus due. Sheppe was at the time of the issuance of the policy, and continued to be until the suit was brought, a member of the church in good standing. Plaintiff is supported and maintained by voluntary contributions from members of the church and yearly assessments levied by church conferences upon the various churches composing them. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained and plaintiff appealed.

NOTE.—The above case is apparently novel although within the range of well-recognized principles. For insurance on life for benefit of betrothed wife, see note to Alexander v. Parker (Ill.) 19 L. R. A. 187.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Fuller & Fuller, for appellant;

In Loomis v. Eagle Life & Health Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 396 (cited with approval in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 481, 24 L. ed. 258), it is said: "All therefore which it seems necessary to show, in order to take the case out of the objection of being a wager policy, is that the insured [the beneficiary] has some interest in the life of the cestui qui vie; that his temporal affairs, his just hopes and well grounded expectations of support, of patronage, and advantage in life will be impaired; so that the real purpose is not a wager, but to secure such advantages, supposed to depend on the life of another; such, we suppose, would be sufficient to prevent it from being regarded as a mere wager."

Trinity College has some interest in the life of every member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of North Carolina.

The interest need not be strictly a legal or definite one. Any substantial pecuniary interest is sufficient.

11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 318.

Insurable interest implies a pecuniary interest, either present or expectant.

Cooke, Life Ins. § 59, p. 94; May, Ins. § 76, p. 139.

Where the relationship between the parties is such as to constitute a good and valid consideration in law for any gift or grant, the transaction is entirely free from such imputation (of wager policy).

Etna L. Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 561, 24 L. ed. 287.

The relationship existing between plaintiff and any member of that church would be sufficient to constitute a good and valid consideration in law for any gift or grant from such member to said plaintiff.

Burbage v. Windley, 13 L. R. A. 409, 108 N. C. 357.

A life policy creates a vested interest in the beneficiaries named in it. The contract may be annulled by the company for cause, but the disposal of the fund while the policy remains in force is not under the control of the insured.

Hooker v. Sugg, 8 L. R. A. 217, 102 N. C. 115; Central Nat. Bank of Washington v. Hume, 128 U. S. 195, 206, 33 L. ed. 870-875. Messrs. Boone & Parker for appellee.

Burwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is said in Mr. May's work on Insurance (sec. 102a) that "to have an insurable interest in the life of another one must be a creditor or surety, or be so related by ties of blood or marriage as to have reasonable anticipation of advantage from his life," and that an insurable interest in the life of another is "such an interest, arising from the relation of the party obtaining the insurance, either as creditor or of surety for the assured, or from ties of blood or marriage to him, as will justify a reasonable expectation of advantage or benefit from the continuance of his life." Accepting these definitions as those which are to be deduced from all the adjudged cases, and leaving out of consideration those cases in which the fact that there was an insurable interest was dependent upon the existence of ties of blood or marriage, we find that this author asserts substantially that, in cases where there exist no ties of blood or marriage, one can have an insurable interest in the life of another only when he is the creditor of or the surety for the assured. Under certain conditions a partner has an insurable interest in the life of his copartner. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Luchs, 108 U. S. 498, 27 L. ed. 800. So, one who is interested pecuniarily in the future earnings of another under a contract with him has an insurable interest in his life. Bevin v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 23 Conn. 244.

These instances, and others that might be mentioned, seem to show that, except in cases where there are ties of blood or marriage, the expectation of advantage from the continuance of the life insured, in order to be reasonable, as the law counts reasonableness, must be founded in the existence of some contracts between the person whose life is insured and the beneficiary, the fulfillment of which the death will prevent; it must appear that by the death there may come damage which can be estimated under some rule of law, for which loss or damage the insurance company has undertaken to indemnify the beneficiary under its policy. When this contractual relation does not exist, and there are no ties of blood or marriage, an insurance policy becomes what the law denominates a "wagering contract," and under its rules, made and enforced in the interest of the best public policy, all such contracts must be declared illegal and void, no matter what good object the parties may really have in view. The end will not, in the eye of the law, justify the means. No error.

Affirmed.

REHEARING, after a reversal, of a writ of error to the Circuit Court for Wayne

*A decision was reached and an opinion handed down in this case on July 23, 1892, by which the judgment of the lower court was reversed. The opinion and an abstract of the briefs will be found in 16 L. R. A. page 842. A rehearing was subsequently granted which resulted in the court's affirming the decree below, as shown by the opinion given herewith.

NOTE.—The above decision reverses on rehearing that reported in 16 L. R. A. 842, in respect to the relationship of fellow servants between a car inspector and a brakeman injured by projection of the load over the end of a car. For similar cases in this series, see Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. 22 L. R. A.

County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Dickinson, Thurber & Stevenson for appellant.

Mr. Otto Kirchner, with Mr. E. W. Meddaugh, for appellee.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

October 21, 1890, the defendant received at Holly, from the Flint & Pere Marquette Railroad, a car loaded with lumber, for the purpose of transporting it to the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company, in Wayne county, at which point it was placed upon the line of the Wabash transfer track. The plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant as a brakeman, and serving on the train in that capacity. He had worked for the company about one year. The train reached the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern junction about 2 o'clock in the morning, and the car was run upon the Wabash transfer track. It became necessary to couple the car to a flat car on the transfer. For the purpose of doing this, the flat car was backed up by the engine to the loaded car. The plaintiff stepped in between to make the coupling, when his body was caught between the two cars. In his struggle to release himself his right hand and the lower portion of his right arm were crushed between the bumpers and drawheads of the cars, and so mangled as to necessitate amputation. It appears that the lumber upon the car received at Holly projected at the bottom at one end beyond the platform of the car for four or five inches, and a distance upwards of a few tiers only. This projection of lumber decreased the distance between the cars, and by it the plaintiff was caught as the cars came together. He claims to have had no knowledge that this lumber projected until the moment he was caught by it. It was a dark night, and he claims he could not see, even though he carried a lantern at the time. The declaration contained five counts. Plaintiff's counsel claims that his demand is founded upon several distinct theories, all involving negligence on the part of the defendant: (1) That he was injured by reason of the defective construction of defendant's flat car, which allowed the two cars to come so close together that he was caught between them, and in his alarm and confusion had his hand and arm caught between the buffers and drawheads. (2) That he was injured by reason of the projection of the lumber beyond the end of the Flint & Pere Marquette car, which, catching his body, and forcing him against the end of the flat car, so hurt and frightened him that in his struggle to escape he unconsciously placed his hand and arm in position to be caught and crushed between the buffers and drawheads. (3) That by reason of the combined effects of the projection of the timber from the one car and the improper construction of the other, he was caught and injured. (4) That he was injured by reason of the necessity of passing his hand and arm directly between the faces of the opposing buffers, because of their being improperly placed in the same horizontal plane with the drawhead upon the flat car. Upon the trial in the court below it was admitted that the car was received from the Flint & Pere Marquette Railway Company, and that at the time it was so received defendant had in its employ a person known as "car inspector," whose duty it was to inspect all cars received by defendant at Holly, and to see that they were properly loaded, and in good condition. After the arguments had been concluded, the court below remarked, substantially, that the claim that the flat car was defective in construction passed out of the case, for the reason that such defect, if it existed, was not the proximate cause of the injury. The court directed the verdict in favor of the defendant, on the ground that the car inspector was a fellow servant with the brakeman, and, inasmuch as it did not appear that the company had not used due care in his selection, it could not be held liable for his negligent inspection, even if he were negligent. The case came to this court, on error, and was argued at the June term, 1892, 16 L. R. A. 342, and by a majority reversed and remanded for new trial. Subsequently a motion for rehearing was granted, and the case has now been fully argued and further considered by the court. The writer of this opinion joined in the opinion for reversal, but since the reargument of the case, and a more full consideration of the principles involved and consequences attendant upon the rules then laid down, has concluded to revise that opinion, and write for affirmance.

The rule that the master must furnish the servant with a reasonably safe place in which to perform his work has been settled by repeated decisions of this court, and in many late cases. Van Dusen v. Letellier, 78 Mich. 492; Morton v. Detroit, B. O. & A. R. Co. 81 Mich. 423; Roux v. Blodgett & Davis Lumber Co. 85 Mich. 519, 13 L. R. A. 728. It is also well settled that this duty cannot be delegated to another, so as to relieve the master from personal responsibility. Van Dusen v. Letellier, and Morton v. Detroit, B. O. & A. R. Co., supra. But the real point in controversy here is whether the duty of the master is to be extended, so that he may be made liable for the neglect of a car inspector in not observing that a car is improperly loaded when it is to be put into the train for transportation. There is no complaint here about the car itself. It was proper in construction, and a safe car for use in that service. Upon the first argument of the case in this court the real point in controversy was not so fully pointed out and considered as upon the reargument, and the case was regarded as very similar in principle to Smith v. Potter, 46 Mich. 258, which Mr. Justice McGrath considered as virtually overruled by the later cases cited above. There is, however, a broad distinction between Smith v. Potter, and the present case. In the former case the injury complained of was received by reason of a defect in the framework of the car itself, while here the accident is attributable to improper loading. In the later decisions the doctrine of Smith v. Potter, has been doubted, and the rule broadly stated that the master must furnish to the servant a safe place to work, and safe appliances to work with. The learned counsel for the defendant does not contend here for the doctrine of Smith v. Potter, but does claim that the defendant discharged its full duty to the plaintiff when it furnished safe cars and a competent inspector; that, having done this, it could not be held liable for the negligence of the inspector, as such inspector was a fellow servant of the plaintiff. The contention of defendant's counsel in this respect is correct. If a car is out of repair, so that it is in a dangerous condition for use, such fact might not be observed by the ordinary brakeman, and manifest only to a person of skill in that line. There is some reason, therefore, for holding the company liable where these circumstances are made to appear, though a competent inspector be furnished, for the master is bound to furnish safe tools and appliances, as well as a safe place to work, and cannot delegate the duty of providing them, and thus escape liability. But in regard to the proper loading of cars quite a different rule must necessarily prevail. The master must undoubtedly exercise care in the selection of inspectors to see that cars are not improperly loaded or overburdened so that they are dangerous to employes, but, after this has been done, it cannot be claimed that the master is to be held responsible for the faithful performance of the inspector's duty. Any other rule than this would make railroad companies insurers of the lives and limbs of employes. In the present case, the projection of the lumber over the end of the car was as apparent to the brakeman, if he had taken the precaution to make observation, as to an inspector. It required no special skill or training to ascertain the fact. The duties of a brakeman are known to be dangerous, and when one enters such service he must be held to have assumed the risk of the employment. He must exercise care himself in going between moving cars to make couplings.

In an exhaustive opinion by Mr. Justice Brewer, reported in 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772 (Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh), the doctrine here enunciated is treated, and a like conclusion reached. A case involving the same principle was before the court of appeals of New York, and decided in 1880, — Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., reported in 117 N. Y. 638. It appeared that cars known as "gondola cars," generally used for carrying coal, and which had boxes from eighteen to twenty-four inches high, were loaded with lumber. The company had furnished suitable stakes which could have been properly fastened inside of the boxes. When the ends of the boxes were stationary, one end of the timber was laid down in the bottom of the car, and the other end projected over the end of the box in cases where the timber was longer than the box. The lumber was piled, after it reached the top of the box, so that one piece overlapped another, the pile thus constantly growing narrower across the top. The cars were loaded under the direction of a foreman of great experience, and, although they were not regular lumber cars, they were much used for carrying lumber for short distances. Plaintiff's intestate, a switchman, was injured by the lumber on one of the cars falling upon him. The cars had been properly inspected before being sent out, by proper and competent inspectors. It was held that the sole cause of the injury was the improper loading of the car through the failure of the employes to use the stakes furnished by the company, and that these employes were the fellow servants of the deceased, for whose carelessness the defendant was not responsible. The same doctrine was also laid down in Byrnes v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 118 N. Y. 251, 4 L. R. A. 151. There the plaintiff's intestate was in defendant's employment as a brakeman. A car loaded with lumber at a way station was to be attached to the train. It was being moved by an engine from the switch to the main track. Plaintiff's intestate got upon it to stop it, but, in consequence of the improper manner in which the car was loaded, the brake was rendered useless, a collision occurred, and he was thrown from the car and killed. In an action to recover damages it appeared that the car and its appliances, before it was loaded, were in good condition. By the defendant's rules it was made the duty of the station master to either inspect the car himself or have some one do so before it was taken out. Had this been done, the improper loading would have been discovered. It was held that, defendant having provided a safe car and a system and competent men for its inspection, it was not liable for injuries resulting to a coemploye from neglect of their duty. This rule was also laid down in the following cases: Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Black, 88 Ill. 112; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gover, 85 Tenn. 465; Northern Cent. R. Co. v. Husson, 101 Pa. 1, 47 Am. Rep. 690. The court below was correct in ruling that the defective condition of the flat car, if it was defective, had no bearing in the case. The plaintiff's injury was produced by the defective loading, and not by any defect in the car.

Judgment must be affirmed.

Hooker, Ch. J., and Grant, J., concurred with Long, J.

Montgomery, J.:

I concur in the result reached by Mr. Justice Long. My reasons are set forth in my opinion on the former hearing.

McGrath, J., dissenting:

This case was originally heard at the April term, 1892, and is reported in 16 L. R. A. 842. A rehearing was granted at the instance of defendant. The trial court, in directing a verdict, was governed by Smith v. Potter, 46 Mich. 258. That case is not only opposed to the clear weight of authority elsewhere, but this court has refused to follow it in a number of cases since determined. Van Dusen v. Letellier, 78 Mich. 492, 503; Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co. 78 Mich. 271, 288; Brown v. Gilchrist, 80 Mich. 56, 68, 65; Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. 81 Mich. 423; Sadowski v. Michigan Car Co. 84 Mich. 100, 105; Tangney v. J. B. Wilson & Co. 87 Mich. 453, 455; Ashman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 90 Mich. 567, 571. The principle underlying the doctrine of these later cases had been announced by Mr. Justice Cooley in Quincy Min. Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 84, 89. In Brown v. Gilchrist the contention of the defendants was that the defendants provided plenty of suitable and good materials of which to construct the falling scaffold, and that they placed the oversight and charge of building it with a competent and fit servant. Mr. Justice Long, speaking for the court, in that case says: "The contract of employment with the plaintiff was that he should have a safe place to work, and the law imposed upon the defendants the duty to furnish such a place. If the scaffold had been erected under the supervision and direction of one of the defendants themselves, and the casualty had occurred, . . . then the plaintiff would have had the right to recover for such injuries, unless himself negligent. I am not prepared to say that the master, under such circumstances, can shift his responsibility by the selection of a foreman; and I do not understand that this doctrine has ever been held by this court." The court then proceeded to discuss the cases of Quincy Min. Co. v. Kitts, and Hoar v. Merritt, 62 Mich. 388, and then concludes as follows: "That is, because the defendants had delegated the authority to Mr. Reed to select proper materials, and to direct, control, and superintend the erection, they should escape liability. If this were the rule, then the more they remained away from their business,—the greater power and authority they gave a foreman or manager to select material, employ men to build a safe and proper scaffold, upon which other servants, who had no knowledge of the manner of its construction, were to be invited to work,—the less the liability. It is the duty of the master to furnish the servant a safe place to work upon, and he cannot shift this responsibility by saying: 'The foreman whom I employed was selected with care, and for his fitness for the work intrusted to him. I pointed out to him all necessary and proper material; and, therefore, though he did not make a proper selection of material, and did not build a safe structure, my hands are clean, and no responsibility rests with me. I have discharged the full measure of my duty to the men whom he guides and controls.' Especially is this true if it appears, as in this case, that he has entrusted the entire management and control of that business in the hands of such foreman, with power to employ the men, and he himself retires from any direction and control over it. Mr. Reed apparently had this authority; and, from the manner of the accident claimed by the plaintiff, it is evident that the men selected by Mr. Reed to find the timber to support these running boards were wholly unfit to build such a scaffold. It was Mr. Reed's duty to examine this scaffold, and see that it was properly built, before sending the plaintiff there to work; and, under the authority delegated to him by the defendants, and the control he assumed of affairs there, he stands in their place, and they must assume the risks of his negligence."

It cannot be said that if Reed had been selected by the defendants to himself put up the scaffold, and his duty had been confined to that particular act, defendants could have escaped liability. In other words, it matters not, so far as the discharge of defendant's duty as master to the employé is concerned, whether Reed's negligence consisted in want of care in supervising the work, or in the performance of the manual labor connected therewith; and the defendants' liability cannot be said to rest solely upon the scope of the authority delegated to him, but rather upon the character of the act committed to his supervision. In the Sadowski Case, Mr. Justice Cahill says: "The rule adopted by the federal courts, and in most of the states, and which seems to us most in consonance with reason and humanity, is that those employed by the master to provide or to keep in repair the place, or to supply the machinery and tools for labor, are engaged in a different employment from those who are to use the place or appliances when provided, and they are not, therefore, as to each other, fellow servants. In such case, the one whose duty it is to provide and look after the safety of the place where the work is to be done represents the master in such a sense that the latter is liable for his negligence." The question is very fully discussed by Mr. Justice Harlan in Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 613; by Mr. Justice Field, in Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 646, 29 L. ed. 755, 758; and by Gresham, J., in King v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 14 Fed. Rep. 277, 280. See also Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 549, 552, 13 Am. Rep. 545; Crispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 516, 87 Am. Rep. 521; Pantear v. Tilly Foster Iron Min. Co. 99 N. Y. 368; Beneing v. Steinway, 101 N. Y. 547; Lewis v. Seifert, 116 Pa. 628, 647; Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. 110 Mass. 240, 260, 14 Am. Rep. 598; Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. 42 N. J. L. 467, 36 Am. Rep. 535; Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 30 Minn. 231; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Fox, 31 Kan. 586; Mulvey v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works, 14 R. I. 204.

The statute makes it the duty of municipalities to keep streets and sidewalks in a condition reasonably fit and safe for travel. Municipalities delegate the care and supervision of their streets and sidewalks to boards, commissioners, and inspectors, who are presumed to be competent; yet municipalities cannot be heard to say that their duty ends with such delegation or that the negligence of such boards, commissioners, or inspectors in respect to that duty is not its negligence.

The rule that it is the master's duty to provide the servant with a safe place to work, and when the service required of an employé is of a peculiarly dangerous character it is the duty of the master to make reasonable provision to protect him from the dangers to which he is exposed while engaged in the discharge of his duty, is not a new rule. It has been recognized by this court in numerous decisions. Swooboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420; Parkhurst v. Johnson, 50 Mich. 70, 45 Am. Rep. 28; Huizaga v. Cutler & Savage Lumber Co. 51 Mich. 272; James v. Emmet Min. Co. 55 Mich. 335; Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501; Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co. 78 Mich. 271; Brown v. Gilchrist, 80 Mich. 56; Sadowski v. Michigan Car Co. 84 Mich. 100; Palmer v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 87 Mich. 281, 93 Mich. 363, 17 L. R. A. 636; Tangney v. J. B. Wilson & Co. 87 Mich. 453; Ragon v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. 91 Mich. 879; Cregg v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 91 Mich. 624.

The legal obligation of the master in respect of his servants, as settled by the adjudicated cases, is to exercise all the care which the exigencies of the occasion require: First, to provide safe and suitable machinery, tools, and appliances, and to keep them in a suitable condition for use, and to provide a safe place for conducting the work; second, to select competent servants, and in sufficient numbers, for the service, and to see that they continue competent and efficient; third, to provide and publish proper rules for the guidance and protection of his servants in the discharge of their duties; fourth, to properly instruct servants under age as to their duties and the hazards involved, etc., and not to subject them to the discharge of duties more hazardous than those for which they were engaged. The language of the first paragraph has been held to include safe instrumentalities and facilities for doing the work assigned the servant. In the Ragon and Oregg Cases, cited above, we held that reasonably safe side tracks upon which brakemen were expected to go to couple cars must be provided. Blank v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 60 N. Y. 607. In Flike v. Boston & A. R. Co., supra, two heavy freight trains were sent out within a few moments of each other. The first train broke in two, and the rear portion collided with the second train, injuring an employé thereupon. The first train had but two brakemen, whereas it should have had three, but the third brakeman was late, and the train was dispatched without him. The court held that it was the duty of the company to have supplied the train with the necessary brakeman. But suppose that the train had been supplied with the necessary brakeman, but the cars had been so loaded as to prevent access to the brakes, could it be said that in that case the company would not be liable? The court in that case says: "It is claimed, by the counsel for the appellant, that the company are not liable, because the agent had, in fact, employed a third brakeman to go upon this train, who, by reason of oversleeping, failed to get aboard in time, and hence, that the injury must be attributed to his negligence, or, if attributable to the negligence of the general agent in not supplying his place with another man, such negligence must be regarded as committed while acting in the capacity of a mere coservant, within the doctrine of irresponsibility. Neither of these positions is tenable. The hiring of a third brakeman was only one of the steps proper to be taken to discharge the principal's duty, which was to supply with sufficient help and machinery and properly dispatch the train in question, and this duty remained to be performed, although the hired brakeman failed to wake up in time, or was sick, or failed to appear for any other reason. It was negligent for the company to start the train without sufficient help. The acts of Rockefeller cannot be divided up, and a part of them regarded as those of the company, and the other part as those of a coservant merely, for the obvious reason that all his acts constituted but a single duty. His acts are indivisible, and the attempt to create a distinction in their character would involve a refinement in favor of corporate immunity not warranted by reason or authority. As well might the company be relieved if the train was started without an engineer, or without brakes, or with a defective engine. The same duty rested upon the company, though every man employed had died or run away during the night, and if negligent in discharging it, either by acts of commission or omission, whether in employing improper help, or not enough of it, or in not requiring their presence upon the train, it is, upon every just principle, responsible for the consequences. Nor is the company relieved, although negligence may be imputed to the defaulting brakeman. The only effect of that circumstance would be to make the negligence contributory with the brakeman, but would not affect the liability of the company." In Dougherty v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (Sup.) 18 N. Y. Supp. 841, strips had been nailed to the drop stakes of a flat car, so as to reach to the top of a load of lumber, and it was held that such strips were a part of the equipment of the car. In Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 107 N. Y. 374, the drop stakes furnished by the shipper were held to be appliances within the rule.

The simple question in this case, it seems to me, is whether the obligation of the master includes within its scope the duty of providing cars so loaded that brakemen may perform their duties in respect to them without greatly increased hazard,—whether the plaintiff in this case can be said to have been furnished with proper facilities for his work. The duty of inspecting the car itself, and that of the inspection of its condition with its load upon it, have a common origin. Both spring from the duty of protection which the master owes to the servant. There is no ground for saying that one of these duties may be delegated so as to relieve the master from all liability, and that the other may not; nor is there reason in saying that the person who inspects the car itself, its appliances and instrumentalities, with reference to the safety of those engaged in its transportation, is not a fellow servant, while he who inspects the loaded car for a like purpose, and to see whether it affords proper facilities for the performance of the duties which must necessarily be performed in its transportation, is a fellow servant. In the present case both duties were delegated to the same person, both are performed with reference to the same end, and the person to whom delegated must be held in the performance of each to occupy the same relation to plaintiff and defendant. It certainly cannot be said that with reference to stationed machinery, belting, shafting, and gearing the master must, at his peril, provide the necessary guards and coverings, and arrange the surroundings so as to render the place reasonably safe, yet, as to a train of cars between which a brakeman is required in the ordinary discharge of his duties to go, while one section is being driven against a standing section or car, so loaded as to render the position of the brakeman one of greatly increased hazard to life and limb, and, in case of injury, the master may escape liability. The employment is at best a dangerous one. It is as essential to the protection of the brakeman that these spaces be kept clear as that the spaces be provided. This danger can be guarded against. As is said by Mr. Justice Long in Palmer v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 87 Mich. 290: "In all cases where the danger can be readily guarded against, the employer is in duty bound to protect the employé at his peril." The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

B. H. LEWIS, Admr. etc., of Alfred Holley, Deceased, Appt.,
v.
Ezekiel WATSON.

(.....Ala.....)

1. A purchaser of land at sheriff's sale cannot, while relying on the title so acquired, impeach the title of the judgment debtor, to prevent his recovering the land in ejectment.
2. A sheriff's deed, to which his name is affixed by another person in his presence and at his request and which the sheriff then duly acknowledged, is as efficacious as though signed by the sheriff himself.
3. There is a sufficient delivery of a deed, in the absence of evidence to weaken the force of the facts, if the judge of probate, before whom it is acknowledged, takes it for the purpose of recording it in his office.
4. Presumption of the delivery of a deed arises if it is found in the possession of the personal representative of the grantee.
5. A return of a levy may properly be indorsed on an execution by a third person at the direction and in the presence of the sheriff.
6. The return of a levy is not essential to the validity of a sheriff's deed to the purchaser at execution sale.

7. In ejectment for land which plaintiff claims by adverse possession evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that the possession has not been continuous, that within the limitation period defendant recovered it in ejectment against plaintiff and was placed in possession.

8. Evidence of admissions or statements made during the limitation period by a plaintiff claiming land by adverse possession, that the land belonged to a third person is admissible in ejectment as tending to show that when they were made plaintiff did not claim ownership.

(June 12, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Covington County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of real estate. Reversed.

Plaintiff claimed to have purchased the land from John B. Dickson in 1866, and to have occupied it under that purchase continuously until 1887 or 1888, when defendant's intestate took violent possession of it.

Defendant claimed under a sheriff's deed executed May 8, 1875, which purported to convey the land in question, and resulted from a judgment against Watson. Defendant claimed to have been in possession of the lot from the time of the sheriff's deed to June 9,

NOTE.—Signing by proxy.

1. Signature written by another.

a. To a deed or mortgage.

A deed will not be held invalid on account of the grantor's name having been signed to such instrument in his presence and at his request by another person, where such grantor acknowledges and delivers such deed. Lovejoy v. Richardson, 68 Me. 388; Bird v. Decker, 64 Me. 550; Kerr v. Russell, 60 Ill. 366, 18 Am. Rep. 634; Nye v. Lowry, 82 Ind. 816; Frost v. Dering, 21 Me. 158; Pierce v. Hakes, 23 Pa. 231; McMurtry v. Brown, 6 Neb. 368; Cushman v. Wooster, 45 N. H. 410; Clough v. Clough, 78 Me. 487, 40 Am. Rep. 386.

And a deed was sustained where the grantor's signature was written by his wife in his absence, and he adopted such signature and acknowledged the instrument. Bartlett v. Drake, 100 Mass. 174, 1 Am. Rep. 101, 97 Am. Dec. 62.

So where one of the subscribing witnesses who could not write directed one of the grantees to subscribe his name. Taton v. White, 95 N. C. 460.

But a deed was not sustained where the grantor had been a lunatic with lucid intervals during one of which his name was signed by his request or his assent, and one of the witnesses did not see the execution of the deed, nor sign at the request of the grantor. Hays v. Hays, 6 Pa. 368.

In Wallace v. McCollough, 1 Rich. Eq. 426, the court was divided on the question whether or not a deed would be invalid which was executed by another writing the grantor's name at her request in her presence.

So a mortgage was held not to be invalid because the name of a grantor was written by another in her presence and at her request. Jansen v. McCahill, 22 Cal. 563, 58 Am. Dec. 84; Gardner v. Gardner, 5 Cush. 438, 52 Am. Dec. 740.

The same rule was said to apply where it was claimed that a mortgage was executed under a forged power of attorney. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 30 N. J. Eq. 198, 22 L. R. A.

But it was said that if a writing giving a right of way was signed by another for the grantor, but not in his presence, it would be void, as the authority to execute should be in writing. Rockford, R. L. & St. L. R. Co. v. Shunick, 65 Ill. 223.

As to other signature to deed, see Harris v. Harris, infra.

b. To notes, contracts, and bonds.

A note is not invalid on account of the obligor's name having been written for him at his instance and request by another person. Haven v. Hobbs, 1 Vt. 238, 18 Am. Dec. 678; Woodbury v. Woodbury, 47 N. H. 11, 90 Am. Dec. 555; Morse v. Green, 18 N. H. 32, 38 Am. Dec. 471; Handyside v. Cameron, 21 Ill. 538, 74 Am. Dec. 119.

And a note was held binding where the party authorized to sign the obligor's name directed a third person to sign for the obligor. Weaver v. Carnall, 35 Ark. 198, 87 Am. Rep. 22; Commercial Bank of Lake Erie v. Norton, 1 Hill, 501.

And in a similar case the validity of the note was held to be a question for the jury. Lord v. Hall, 8 C. B. 681.

But a defendant who could not read or write, who was on trial for perjury in denying the execution of a note, which was charged to have been written for him at his request, should have been permitted to show that the writing was understood by the parties to be only a contract to arbitrate. Flemister v. State, 48 Ga. 170.

A signature to a contract written by another at the request and in the presence of the obligor is binding on such obligor. Harris v. Story, 2 E. D. Smith, 363; Mallon v. Story, Id. 331; Crow v. Carter, 5 Ind. App. 169.

And the same applies to a letter of attorney directing a sale of land. Irvine v. Thompson, 4 Bibb, 295.

And the same was held where the obligor held the top of the pen while his name was being written. Helshaw v. Langley, 11 L. J. Ch. N. S. 17.

A contract was sustained where a party finding-1890, with the exception of a short time when Watson entered the land clandestinely, because of which defendant claimed that he had recovered the land in ejectment against Watson.

Further facts appear in the opinion.
Mr. John Gamble for appellant.
Mr. J. W. Posey for appellee.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a statutory action for the recovery of a certain lot of land in the town of Andalusia. Watson is plaintiff, and Lewis, as administrator of one Holley, deceased, is defendant. Plaintiff derives title from one Dixon by deed appearing to have been executed in 1866. Defendant claims title through Watson, under a sale and conveyance by the sheriff to his intestate in 1875, made in satisfaction of certain judgments against Watson, and also by virtue of an adverse possession on the part of the intestate and himself subsequent to said sale and conveyance.

1. Some rulings were made on the trial in respect of Watson's title to the land prior to the sheriff's sale and conveyance of it, as his property, to Holley, and upon testimony in relation thereto. These are of no importance in the case, and, whether erroneous or not, in the abstract, need not be considered, since the defendant—claiming, as he does, under that title, and having recognized its validity by purchasing at the sheriff's sale, and now further recognizing it by a reliance upon the acquisition of it through that sale, and upon adverse possession since that time under the color of title, with which, at least, he was invested by the conveyance then made by the sheriff—is not in a position to impeach Watson's original title. Ware v. Deuberry, 84 Ala. 568; Houston v. Farris, 71 Ala. 570; Tennessee & C. R. Co. v. East Alabama R. Co. 75 Ala. 516, 525, 51 Am. Rep. 475.

2. The evidence as to the execution of the deed by the sheriff to Holley was that of the probate judge of the county, and is as follows: "That J. A. Thompson, the sheriff, could not write his name and that he [the witness] frequently wrote in the sheriff's office for said Thompson; that he indorsed the levies on the execution here in evidence, and wrote the deed of Thompson, as sheriff, to Alfred Holley, dated May 8, 1875; that said deed and indorsements on said levies are in his handwriting; that said J. A. Thompson was present when said deed was written; that it was written in the sheriff's office, at her name signed thereto by her brother, delivered the same, saying she knew his handwriting. Speckels v. Sax, 1 E. D. Smith, 253.

So an indorsement of consent by an assignee for creditors under Wis. Rev. Stat., 1898, requiring an indorsement in writing, is not invalid when written by another in the presence and under the direction of the assignee. Scott v. Seaver, 52 Wis. 175.

An assignment of a benefit certificate signed by another for a member not in his presence but made under verbal instructions received through a third party was sustained. Schmidt v. Iowa K. of P. Ins. Assn. 11 L. R. A. 205, 82 Iowa, 304.

And an apprentice indenture was sustained where the names of father and apprentice were written in their presence at their request and the paper was delivered and acted upon. Rex v. Longnor, 4 Barn. & Ad. 647, 1 Nev. & M. 576.

In an action on an order of certificates against the drawer's estate where such order had been written for him by another the plaintiff was non-suited, as the right to receive the certificate abated on the death of the drawer. McKee v. Myers, Add. Rep. 81.

Cutting off the names of signers from a duplicate petition for county seat location and attaching them to one of the same petitions, which signatures are accepted by the county board, is an irregularity but will not invalidate the petition. Douglass v. Baker County Comrs. 23 Fla. 419.

Under the Statute of Frauds, § 17, requiring contracts to be signed by the parties or their agents thereunto lawfully authorized it was held that one party to a contract could not sign the name of the other although so directed. Wright v. Dannah, 2 Campb. 208.

A marriage contract signed in the name of one of the parties at her request by her brother, although not in her immediate presence, was sustained. Reinhart v. Miller, 22 Ga. 402, 65 Am. Dec. 508.

But where an obligor by reason of age and infirmity could not write but directed his daughter to sign the bond for him, and for that purpose laid the paper down on a table in the house and turned away and went out into the yard, and she then signed his name, and at the time could hear her father conversing in the yard but could not see him, the bond was held invalid. Kime v. Brooks, 31 N. C. 218.

This was on the ground that the principal must be in a situation to control the action of the agent and seems to conflict with the decision of Reinhart v. Miller, supra, in which case, however, the court said there was no occasion for ratification but, as she married the party contracting, it might also be sustained on that ground.

A bond under seal to which the name and seal of the obligor is attached by another is not invalid, where such obligor acknowledges it to be his act and deed. Rhode v. Louthain, 8 Blackf. 412.

And a surety on a recognizance is not released by the fact that the name of the principal was not signed by the latter's own hand. Com. v. Basendorf, 26 Atl. Rep. 779, 153 Pa. 459.

And a surety was not released by the fact that his name was written by another in his presence and by his direction. Croy v. Busenbark, 72 Ind. 48; Goodell v. Bates, 14 R. I. 65.

The question as to the release of the sureties on the ground of the decision in the cases infra arising in the Kentucky statute does not seem to be discussed; and in the case of Goodell v. Bates, supra, the court also held it valid on the ground of ratification.

But in Kentucky the surety is released in such a case under Gen. Stat., chap. 22, § 1, requiring the promise to pay the debt of another to be in writing signed by himself or his authorized agent, and chap. 22, § 20, providing that a surety shall not be bound by the act of an agent unless his authority is in writing signed by the principal. Simpson v. Com. 89 Ky. 412; Dickson v. Luman, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 884; Ragan v. Chenault, 78 Ky. 545; Billington v. Com. 79 Ky. 400.

c. To writs and notices.

A writ is not invalid where the name of the magistrate is signed to the same in his presence and by his direction by another. Hanson v. Rowe, 26 N. H. 327; Cushman v. Wooster, 45 N. H. 410.

And a magistrate may refuse to quash a writ to Thompson's instance, and under his direction; that, after the deed was written, Thompson told him to sign his name, as sheriff, to the deed, which he did, and then, as judge of probate, took Thompson's acknowledgment to the deed, and carried it into the probate office, and afterwards recorded it; . . . and that some one came and got the deed from the probate office after it was recorded, but don't now remember who it was." It is not entirely clear, on this testimony, that Thompson was actually and immediately present when his name was subscribed to the deed by Fletcher, by his direction; but, manifestly, there was room for an inference to be drawn to that effect by the jury. If he was so present, as the jury might have found, the subscription to the instrument was as efficacious as if he had been able to write his name, and with his own hand had written it, or, he being unable to write his name, as if he had made his mark, and the words, "his mark," had been written against it, and had the signature thus made attested by two witnesses. This on the principle that where the grantor is present, and authorizes another, either expressly or impliedly, to sign his name to the deed, it then becomes his deed, and is as binding upon him, to all intents and purposes, as if he had personally affixed his signature. The reason for the doctrine is thus stated by Shaw, Ch. J.: "The name being written by another hand, in the presence of the grantor, and at her request, is her act. The disposing capacity, the act of mind, which are the essential and efficient ingredients of the deed, are hers; and she merely uses the hand of another, through incapacity or weakness, instead of her own, to do the physical act of making a written sign. To hold otherwise would be to decide that a person having a full mind, and clear capacity, but, through physical inability incapable of making a mark, could never make a conveyance or execute a deed." Gardner v. Gardner, 5 Cush. 483, 52 Am. Dec. 740; 1 Devlin, Deeds, §§ 232, 233; Kims v. Brooks, 81 N. C. 218; Frost v. Deering, 21 Me. 158; Videau v. Griffin, 21 Cal. 890; Me. Rev. Stat. 1857, p. 56; Lovejoy v. Richardson, 68 Me. 886; Bird v. Decker, 64 Me. 551.

3. And it would seem that if the signing by Fletcher, under the direction, and in the immediate presence, of Thompson, was not in itself efficacious, the subsequent acknowledgment of the latter, as shown on the deed, would be a sufficient recognition and adoption of the signature as his own. Bartlett v.

which his name has been signed under his direction and in his presence by another. Achorn v. Matthews, 88 Me. 173.

And where an attorney attached a genuine signature of a magistrate to a writ, which was authorized by the magistrate, the writ was sustained. Richardson v. Bachelder, 19 Me. 82.

But a return upon a warrant calling a town meeting cannot be written and signed by another, for the constable who executed the same. Chapman v. Limerick, 56 Me. 300.

This last decision is on the ground that official signatures must be signed by the officer in person and reconciles the preceding cases in Maine by claiming that in Achorn v. Matthews, supra, the adoption of a signature was an exercise of discretion from which no appeal lies; and in Richardson v. Bachelder, supra, the signature was a genuine signature of the magistrate which had been once written by him.

The case of Chapman v. Limerick, is not supported by other authority, and is believed to be an exceptional case. The Statute of Construction, section 4, rule 18, also provides,—when a signature of a person is required he must write it or make a mark.

A writ signed in the name of a justice of the peace by his direction where such justice was not present is invalid. Kidder v. Prescott, 24 N. H. 267.

But a signature to a summons made for the plaintiff in his presence and by his direction by another was sustained. Hotchkiss v. Cutting, 14 Minn. 537.

And so with a return of nulla bona on a f. fa. made for a constable. Ellis v. Francis, 9 Ga. 327.

And a scale of costs may be signed for a solicitor in his name by his clerk under County Court Rules 1889, App. France v. Dutton, infra.

And the same was held in regard to a notice calling a meeting of bankrupt's creditors signed for the debtor's attorney by his clerk. Re Hirst, L. R. 18 Eq. 704.

And a notice of appeal signed in the name of appellant by his attorney's clerk was not invalid. Reg. v. Justices of Kent, L. R. 8 Q. B. 305.

But a notice of objection to a voter's registration signed by another for such objector was invalid under a statute requiring such notice to be signed 22 L. R. A.

by the person objecting. Toms v. Cuming, 7 Mann. & G. 88.

In this case the notice was properly signed but the duplicate was not and the duplicate was served instead of the original.

And a notice of a call for subscription required to be signed by the trustees or by the clerks employed by them could not be signed for such clerks by one employed by them, as this would be an attempt to substitute a deputy for a deputy. Miles v. Bough, 5 Q. B. 845.

d. To wills.

A will may be signed by another for the testator at the request of the testator and in his presence and will not be invalid where such signature or will is acknowledged by the testator. Green v. Crain, 12 Gratt. 232; Catlett v. Catlett, 55 Mo. 841; Herbert v. Berrier, 81 Ind. 1; Re Elcock, 30 L. T. N. S. 757; Re Marshall, 13 L. T. N. S. 643; Merchant's Will, Tucker, 151; Haynes v. Haynes, 33 Ohio St. 596, 31 Am. Rep. 579; Hall v. Hall, 17 Pick. 373; Cochran's Will, 3 Bibb. 491; Shanks v. Christopher, 3 A. K. Marsh. 144.

And when so signed the subsequent addition of a mark is superfluous. Rosser v. Franklin, 6 Gratt. 1, 52 Am. Dec. 97; Sechrest v. Edwards, 4 Met. (Ky.) 163.

And is not invalid where the name of the testator was written by an attesting witness of the will. Re Bailey, 1 Curt. Ecol. Rep. 914; Robins v. Coryell, 27 Barb. 556; Re Stevens, 17 N. Y. S. R. 785.

And the same doctrine was announced in other cases although the question was not directly involved. Butler v. Benson, 1 Barb. 323; Dewis v. Lewis, 13 Barb. 17; Rigg v. Wilton, 13 Ill. 15, 44 Am. Dec. 419; Miles' Will, 4 Dana, 1.

But a will signed for the testator by another was invalid where the will was presented to the attesting witnesses at different times. Burwell v. Corbin, 1 Rand. (Va.) 131, 10 Am. Dec. 494.

This, however, was in effect overruled in Dudleys v. Dudleys, 3 Leigh, 423, which sustained a similar will and claimed that Burwell v. Corbin was a case in a court of chancery acting on a special verdict and the other was a case of court of probate acting on the evidence. The Statute of 1841, since then,

Drake, 100 Mass. 174, 1 Am. Rep. 101, 97 Am. Dec. 92.

4. Certain it is that this acknowledgment relieves the deed from any infirmity which might otherwise have affected it on account of the signature not being attested by witnesses. 1 Brickell, Dig. p. 580, § 18 et seq.; 8 Brickell, Dig. p. 298, § 18.

5. As we have seen, Fletcher, the probate judge, took the deed, after it was signed and acknowledged, for the purpose of recording it in his office. This, nothing appearing to the contrary, may well be considered as a delivery to him by the grantor for that purpose; and, so considered, "there being no evidence to weaken the force of these facts," this constituted sufficient proof of delivery to the grantee. Elisberry v. Boykin, 65 Ala. 336; Alexander v. Alexander, 71 Ala. 295; Sheffield Land, Iron & Coal Co. v. Neill, 87 Ala. 158.

6. And, moreover, at the time of the trial below, this deed was in the possession of the personal representative of the grantee, who in that capacity had also the possession of the land in controversy, and was defendant to this action for its recovery. The presumption from this fact alone, unexplained, is that the provides that the witnesses shall both attest at the same time.

It was said that an acknowledgment would not validate a will if signed for the testator by another, if such signature was purposely concealed from the view of the testator and of the witnesses. Baskin v. Baskin, 36 N. Y. 416.

But it may be signed for the testator even if the wrong name is written for the testator's name, as the name of the witness. Re Clark, 2 Curt. Ecol. Rep. 329.

The same was held in Baldwin's Estate, 16 W. N. O. 300, going to the extent, however, of putting the decision on the ground that the act authorizing signature by another does not prescribe the manner of signing, and the further ground that the name of the testator at the beginning was a signature.

Where a person subscribes the testator's name to a will, such person must also write his own name. Meehan v. Bourke, 2 Bradf. 385; Guthrie v. Price, 23 Ark. 396.

And a will is sufficiently signed in the presence of the testatrix where at her request her name had been previously written thereto by another person, and the latter in her presence and by her request adds to her name words showing that it was written by him at her request. Ex parte Leonard (S. C.), post, 302.

And where a statute requires the party writing the testator's name to write his own name as a witness to such will and state that he signed the testator's name at his request, a signature, "A. B. by C. D. in his presence and at his request," was a substantial compliance with the statute. Abraham v. Wilkins, 17 Ark. 232.

And "E. N. for R. D. at her request," was a valid signature. Vernon v. Kirk, 30 Pa. 218.

A party writing the testator's name must state that he subscribed such name at the testator's request and sign his own name. McGee v. Porter, 14 Mo. 61, 55 Am. Dec. 129.

Under the provision of the statute requiring this the courts in Missouri hold that the name written near a mark is the name written by such other person, and that this is the signature and not the mark. Northcutt v. Northcutt, 20 Mo. 266; Simpson v. Simpson, 27 Mo. 238; St. Louis Hospital Asso. v. Williams, 19 Mo. 609; St. Louis Hospital Asso. v. Wegman, 21 Mo. 17.

The effect of these decisions will be that in Missouri if a will is signed by mark, the name of the testator should not be annexed to the same or else it will control and be the signature, and then such signature must be attested as if there was no mark.

But other courts hold that the name at the mark though written by another does not constitute the signature, unless so indicated by attesting words, but the mark is the signature. Pool v. Buffum, 3 Or. 438; Jackson v. Jackson, 39 N. Y. 153; Main v. Ryder, 84 Pa. 217.

Under N. J. Stat. 1861, providing that all wills shall be signed by the testator and such signature or the making thereof be acknowledged by him, a signature by another for the testatrix at her request in her presence and in the presence of the witnesses cannot be made sufficient by her acknowledgment that it is her name and seal because the witnesses know, notwithstanding her acknowledgment, that she has not signed the will as the statute required. Re McElwaine's Will, 18 N. J. Eq. 499.

And under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat., § 40, subsec. 2, providing that the subscription must be made by the testator in the presence of the witnesses or acknowledged to have been so made to each of the witnesses, a will is invalid where the testator does not acknowledge that he signed or authorized some one to sign for him, although he puts his finger on his name to a signed will and says it is his will. Chaffee v. Baptist Missionary Convention, 10 Paig. 85, 4 L. ed. 396, 40 Am. Dec. 225.

And under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1873, chap. 47, § 5, allowing a will to be signed by another for the testator by his express direction, such direction must precede the signing and is not to be implied from looks or gestures, or assent. Waite v. Frisbie, 45 Minn. 361.

And a request for another to sign for the testator, which was refused, will not validate an unsigned will. Stricker v. Groves, 5 Whart. 388.

The name of an attesting witness to a will may be written for such witness by another. Lord v. Lord, 58 N. H. 7, 42 Am. Rep. 566; Upchurch v. Upchurch, 16 B. Mon. 102; Re Strong, 39 N. Y. S. R. 352, 2 Connoly, 574; Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57, 53 Am. Dec. 102.

So a will was not invalid where the witnesses who were not able to write held the top of the pen while their names were written. Lewis v. Lewis, 2 Swab. & T. 153.

But where they could write and held the top of the pen while another wrote their names the attestation was invalid. Re Killeher, 6 Notes of Cases, 15.

There is some conflict on this question, some of the English cases adopting the view that the witness must assist in some way—by touching the pen or making a mark.

This has been followed by some American cases, which, as expressed in Lord v. Lord, supra, do not appear to have been very thoroughly considered. Horton v. Johnson, infra, says that as the statute authorizes some one to sign for the testator, and does not provide for witnesses, that the mention of one thing excludes the other. In Simmons v. Leonard, infra, the witness did not know whether the testatrix signed or not.

And so it has been decided that one of the witnesses cannot sign for the other. Riley v. Riley, 36 Ala. 496; Horton v. Johnson, 18 Ga. 396; Re Duggin, 39 L. J. P. 24; Re Cope, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 835; Re Mead, 1 Notes of Cases, 456; Simmons v. Leonard, 91 Tenn. 153; Re White, 2 Notes of Cases, 461, 7 Jur. 1045.

execution of the instrument had been duly perfected by a delivery of it to the grantee. Cherry v. Herring, 88 Ala. 458; Simmons v. Simmons, 78 Ala. 365. And our conclusion, therefore, is that it is shown by the evidence in this record that there was an efficacious delivery of the deed by the grantor, the sheriff, to the grantee, Alfred Holley.

7. It is stated in the bill of exceptions, immediately following the copy of the deed, that "the Jordan lot, No. 1, in the above deed, was interlined in different handwriting from the body of the deed." This "Jordan lot, No. 1" is the lot involved in this suit. We need only say, in this connection, that this statement is not borne out by a reference to the original deed, which is before us by order of the trial judge. The lot in controversy, leaving out of view the interlineation, is therein described and conveyed as "lot No. 1, east of the public square," and it clearly appears that this lot No. 1, on the east side of the public square, is the Jordan lot. This would have been a sufficient description, in the particular under consideration, had nothing more been said; but it seems that the grantor did not think so, and, for the purpose of curing what might be supposed to be an insufficient description, he interlined—the interlineation and the body of the deed being clearly in the same handwriting—the words, "the lot known as the 'Jordan lot.'" Manifestly, the interlineation accorded "with all the purposes and objects of the deed." The

And is invalid where the witness whose name was signed was not present. Re Leverington, 11 Prob. Div. 80, 55 L. J. P. 62; Pryor v. Pryor, 29 L. J. P. 114. And is invalid where the name was written for the witness and he then signed his own name, being in fact attested by only one witness. Re Leroy, 8 Bradf. 227.

See also sub-heads, "Guiding the hand of subscriber;" "Printed signature," etc.

2. "Guiding the hand of subscriber."

Where the testator signing a will is in full possession of his faculties, his signature will not be invalid although he was assisted or his hand guided in making the same. Vines v. Clingfost, 21 Ark. 309; Watson v. Pipes, 32 Miss. 468; Fritz v. Turner, 46 N. J. Eq. 516; Vandruff v. Rinehart, 29 Pa. 232; Den v. Vancleve, 4 Wash. C. C. 282.

And the same rule was applied to a deed where the grantor was assisted in signing. Harris v. Harris, 59 Cal. 620.

So a will is not invalid where the testator affixes, in the proper place, with his own hand, characters which he declared to be his signature although he was aided in directing the movements of his hand and pen by another. Van Hanswyck v. Wiese, 44 Barb. 494.

So a will was not invalid where the testator was assisted in making his mark to his signature. Cozens' Will, 61 Pa. 196; Wilson v. Beddard, 12 Sim. 23; Re Shotwell's Estate, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 444, 30 W. N. C. 232, 1 Pa. Dist. Rep. 267, 9 Lanc. L. Rev. 203.

Where two witnesses to a will swore that the testator did not publish it as his will, but that his hand was guided by another, and the testator made his mark but said nothing nor was he capable, but it was proven that three days after he was sensible and able to converse, the will was sustained and the court directed the witnesses to be committed for perjury. Hudson's Case, Skin. 79.

So a witness to a will may be assisted in making his signature. Campbell v. Logan, 2 Bradf. 90; Harrison v. Elvin, 3 Q. B. 117; Re Frith, 27 L. J. P. 6.

But probate was refused where the hand of the testator was guided in signing the will and he was not able to comprehend fully what was being done, and the signature was not his free act. Tucker v. Sandidge, 85 Va. 546; Rollwagen v. Rollwagen, 68 N. Y. 518.

Printed signature or by stamp.

In regard to using a printed signature for bank notes section 5172 of National Bank Act authorizes the issue of circulating notes signed by the written or engraved signature of the treasurer and register expressing also the promise of the association receiving the same to pay on demand attested by the signatures of the president or vice-president and cashier.

There seems to be a scarcity of decisions on the question of using engraved signatures on bank bills, and it is believed that Pennington v. Baehr, 23 L. R. A.

infra, as to signature to coupons, is the only one of the kind on that subject. N. Y. Laws 1883, chap. 260, § 21, required bank notes to be signed by the president or vice-president and cashier.

11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV., chap. 23, was passed to enable his majesty, who was laboring under severe indisposition which rendered it painful and inconvenient for him to sign with his own hand instruments which required the royal sign manual, to appoint certain persons to affix it, by means of a stamp. A special provision was also made for bank notes.

Coupons of bonds issued by the fund commissioners having the signatures printed thereon were held valid and binding. Pennington v. Baehr, 48 Cal. 565.

A printed signature adopted or used by the signer is as binding and valid as though written, and this applies to the signature of a clerk to the resolution of intention to make a tax assessment. Williams v. McDonald, 58 Cal. 529.

Or to a signature required to a summons. Ligare v. California S. R. Co. 78 Cal. 610; Herrick v. Morrill, 37 Minn. 250 (overruling Ames v. Schurmeier, 9 Minn. 221); Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Ross, 10 Abb. Pr. 280, note (overruling Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Dickson, 9 Abb. Pr. 61); Mezohen v. Mora, 54 Wis. 214.

And Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Ross, supra, is sustained by Barnard v. Heydrick, 49 Barb. 62, 32 How. Pr. 101, on the ground that 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat., 278, § 70, providing a penalty for any attorney permitting any person not his partner or clerk to use his name implies that his name may be used by a clerk.

And the same is held in regard to the name of the prosecuting attorney signed to an indictment. Hamilton v. State, 103 Ind. 96, 58 Am. Rep. 491.

Or to the name of an attorney printed to a complaint. Hancock v. Bowman, 49 Cal. 413.

And applies to a printed signature to a contract of warranty on the back of a machine note. Grieb v. Cole, 60 Mich. 397.

And is held to apply to sutler's checks. Weston v. Myers, 93 Ill. 424.

And a stamp may be used instead of a written signature by an objector, to a name of a voter. Bennett v. Brumfitt, L. R. 3 C. P. 23.

And may be used to sign testator's name to a will. Re Emerson, L. R. 9 Ir. 443; Jenkyns v. Galsford, 3 Swab. & T. 98, 32 L. J. P. 71, 122, 9 Jur. N. S. 311, 630, 3 L. T. N. S. 517, 11 Week. Rep. 601, 854.

And may be used for signature of liquidators of a bank. Ex parte Birmingham Bk., Co. L. R. 3 Ch. App. 651.

But a lithograph signature of solicitor is not sufficient under County Court Rules 1889, requiring the solicitor to indorse on the particulars his name, and appendix requiring signing the same. Reg. v. Cowper, L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 533; France v. Dutton [1891], 2 Q. B. 208.

fair presumption is that it was made before the acknowledgment of execution, and the burden of repelling the presumption rested on the plaintiff. Sharpe v. Orme, 61 Ala. 263.

8. The fact that Fletcher indorsed the levies under which the sale was made on the executions for the sheriff is of no consequence. Even were it essential to the validity of defendant's deed that the return should have been made by the sheriff, the facts here show an adoption and ratification by the latter of the indorsement made by Fletcher so as to make it his own; and it was his own in the first instance, if entered by Fletcher by his direction, and in his presence. But the return of the levy is not essential to the validity of the sheriff's deed to the purchaser at execution sale. 2 Freeman, Executions, § 841; Forrest v. Camp, 16 Ala. 642; Love v. Powell, 5 Ala. 58; Driver v. Spence, 1 Ala. 540.

9. It follows from what we have said that if the jury believe that Fletcher signed the sheriff's name to the deed we have been discussing at the instance and in the presence of the latter, as is inferable from the evidence, Holley acquired a perfect title to the land in question on May 8, 1875, when that deed was executed. It is not pretended that there has been any conveyance of this title by Holley, or his privies in estate, since that time, nor is it pretended that Watson has received a conveyance of this land from any source since that time. The legal title to the lot, therefore, was at the time, and for all the purposes of the trial, in the estate of Holley, and represented in this action by the defendant Lewis, as his administrator, unless Watson, for some period of ten years after May 8, 1875, and prior to the institution of this suit, had been in the open, adverse, uninterrupted possession, under a claim of right; and that is really, we take it, the main question at issue in the case. On that issue it would, we think, be competent for the defendant to show by the records of the circuit court, in a former action of ejectment between these parties, that Holley recovered therein against Watson, and was put into possession of the land, under a writ of assistance in May, 1880, as going, not in bar of this action for a former recovery, but to show that, at the time referred to, Holley, and not Watson, was in possession. It would, in our opinion, also be competent for the defendant to show any admissions or statements, made under oath or otherwise, by the plaintiff, subsequent to 1875, to the effect that the land was another's, and not his, as going to show that at the time they were made he was not in possession of the lot under a claim of ownership, and as also tending to impeach his evidence in that regard on another trial of this cause, should it then be the same or like that on the trial which we are now reviewing.

Many rulings of the trial court on the admission of evidence, and in respect of charges given and refused, are out of harmony with the foregoing opinion. What we have said will suffice for the circuit court's guidance on another trial, without a specification here of the particulars in which error appears by this record.

Reversed and remanded.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Ex parte B. E. LEONARD, Executor, etc., of Emeline Bowen, Deceased.

Mary DIAL et al., Appts.

(.....S. C.....)

1. One who signs the name of a testatrix at her request may be also one of the subscribing witnesses to the will.
2. Express directions by a testatrix to sign her name to the will are sufficiently given by her answering, "Yes," to one who inquires if he shall sign the will for her.
3. A will is sufficiently signed in the presence of the testatrix, although her name had been previously written thereto by another person, where the latter, in her presence, and by her request, adds to her name words showing that it was written by him at her request.

(November 3, 1893.)

APPEAL by Mary Dial et al. from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Laurens County dismissing an appeal from an order of the Probate Court admitting to probate an alleged will of Emeline Bowen, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

NOTE.—On the question as to signing an instrument by proxy or by the hand of another, see the note to the case preceding.

Mr. W. H. Martin, for appellants:

It was clearly error to instruct the jury that the party requested to sign the will of another could adopt the signature of testatrix previously written by him by signing his name as agent. Such a proposition is in conflict with all the rules and precedents of the common law and in conflict and violative of the spirit and intent of the statute.

Our court has held in State v. Whitesides, 8 L. R. A. 777, 80 S. C. 586, that the general assembly could not ratify a void act done by it.

It was error to instruct the jury that S. S. Knight was a competent witness to the execution of testatrix's will.

Sugden, Essay on Wills, p. 88, referred to in Williams on Executors, p. 72.

A party acting as agent or under power of attorney certainly cannot witness his own acts, and the rule ought to apply more rigidly in case one acts under mere verbal instruction.

The language of the statute is imperative in the presence of the testatrix, and the witnesses too. The express direction to sign for testatrix is a substantive part of the execution of the will (Greenough v. Greenough, 11 Pa. 439, cited in footnote to Wms. Exrs. p. 56). This being the case no one can sign for testatrix until expressly directed, and if they attempt to do so before this express direction is given the act is a nullity.

Messrs. Haskell & Dial also for appellants.

M.R. H. J. Haynsworth, for respondent: Express means "directly stated, not implied or left to inference."

7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 538.

An express direction is one stated, not implied from silence or the conduct of a party. It is not necessary that all the words should be spoken by him who gives the direction.

An express contract is one expressed in words.

3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 842.

This may consist of proposal and acceptance. Id. 841.

In Coffin v. Coffin, 23 N. Y. 15, the court said: "The statute requires that the testator, when he subscribes a will, or acknowledges its execution to the witnesses, shall declare the instrument to be his last will and testament. But this declaration need not be in any particular form. . . . There can be no doubt that such a declaration can be made in answer to a question, or even by a sign."

The law requires that all wills shall be signed by the testator or by some other person in his presence and by his express directions.

Gen. Stat. § 1854.

"Sign" (2 Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict., p. 1192): "In the primary sense of the word, a person signs a document when he writes or marks something on it in token of his intention to be bound by its contents. . . . Any mark is sufficient if it shows an intention to be bound by the document."

A signing, then, is the writing or marking something on a document with the intention to be bound by it. Any mark made with this purpose will be a sufficient signing.

Adams v. Chaplin, 1 Hill, Eq. 265; Ray v. Hill, 3 Strobb. L. 303, 304, 49 Am. Dec. 647; Brown v. Butchers & D. Bank, 6 Hill, 443.

The name itself is valuable as a signature only so far as it more certainly evidences the intention to be bound.

The signature must have been placed there with the design of finally authenticating the instrument, no further signature on the marker's part being contemplated.

Schouler, Wills, § 818; 1 Jarman, Wills, 80.

The testator or an attesting witness may sign his initials or a mark, etc. Yet if the intended signature is incomplete, as if after writing his Christian name he finds himself unable to finish, this will not be a good signature.

Tucker v. Ozner, 12 Rich. L. 148, says: "Witnesses are required to attest the signing, and the words of the act plainly imply that they shall attest the factum of signing. But a more liberal construction has been adopted, and it is now well settled that the acknowledgment of the testator that it is his handwriting, his will, etc., is a sufficient attestation of the act of signing."

The party who signs for the testator may sign his own name first and that of the testator after.

The one who signs the will for testator may be a subscribing witness. The affirmative is the universal holding.

McGowan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On August 16, 1890, Emeline Bowen, widow, departed this life. On September 6th thereafter a paper writing, purporting to be her last will and testament, was filed in the office of the probate judge of Laurens county, who admitted the same to probate in common form, and on October 20, 1891, Albert Dial and others, the heirs and distributees of deceased, if she died intestate, filed their petition that Benjamin E. Leonard, the party producing said paper, be required to prove the same in due form of law on or before November 15th thereafter. On November 11, 1891, said Leonard filed his petition accordingly, and on June 23, 1892, the matter came on for a hearing in the probate court, and, after hearing the testimony of the subscribing witnesses and others, both for and against the said will, the probate judge filed his decree admitting the same to probate in due form of law, whereupon Albert Dial, Elizabeth Teague, and others appealed to the court of common pleas of the said county. At the February term of the court thereafter the proceedings on appeal came on for a hearing before his honor Judge Norton, who submitted two questions to the jury: (1) Was the paper duly executed as a will? (2) Was Mrs. Emeline Bowen, at the time of executing the will, competent to make a will? On these issues of will or no will there was much testimony, covering nearly 100 pages of printed matter, reported by the stenographer, as it fell from the witnesses, and of course it cannot be restated here; but, in order to make the points intelligible, it will be necessary to make a short and condensed statement of facts as developed. It appeared that Mrs. Bowen, the testatrix, was very sick with what was called "typhoid fever," and that about noon of August 16, 1890, she asked her attending physician, Dr. S. S. Knight, to prepare her will for her, and gave him minute instructions as to how she wished it drawn, of which the doctor took rough notes. Among other things, she asked him if it would not do for him to sign her will for her, as she was so nervous, to which he replied that he thought so. Later the doctor drafted the will, and, as he testifies, he first prepared it to be signed by "a mark," by leaving a blank space, and writing "her mark" above and below respectively. It is not very clear whether he then wrote the name of "Emeline Bowen" in preparing for the mark, but we think it probable that he did. After having done this, the doctor says he concluded that it would be best not to sign with "a mark," and so erased the words "her mark." About twilight he procured two other witnesses, and, went to Mrs. Bowen's room, which was lighted by a lamp. He then produced the paper, and told Mrs. Bowen that it was her will, and was ready to be executed. He recalled to her attention what she had said about signing the will, by asking her, "Shall I sign the will for you?" to which she answered "Yes," and he signed the will for her. It is not quite clear whether he did this by writing then all the words "Emeline Bowen. By S. S. Knight, by request," or whether, the name "Emeline Bowen" having been previously written in preparing the will for "a mark," and not having been erased, the signing was merely by writing under the name "Emeline Bowen" the other words, "By S. S. Knight, by request." Then each of the witnesses in turn signed the paper, including Dr. Knight, who signed the paper for the deceased. All this was done in the presence of the testatrix, who was lying in bed, with her face towards the little table in the room, on which the paper rested, in full view of all who chose to use their senses. Mrs. Bowen died on the next day night, within thirty hours after the signing of the paper. After a full and careful charge, the jury found both issues of fact referred to them in the affirmative,—that Mrs. Bowen was competent to make a will, and that the will was executed according to law. The contestants did not except to the finding on the second issue, that Mrs. Bowen was competent to make a will, and therefore that issue goes out of the contest; but they did except to the finding on the first issue, as to the manner of the alleged execution of the paper propounded as a will, and moved for a new trial, which was refused; and then the whole issues involved came on to be heard by the presiding judge, who, after argument, held and decreed as follows: "The parties seeking to set aside the probate of the will raise and urge the following propositions before me now: 'First. That the witness S. S. Knight is not a competent witness, as he signed the name of the testatrix to the paper propounded as a will. Second. That the will was not signed by S. S. Knight in the presence of testatrix. Third. That the will was not signed by her express direction. Fourth. The signature of testatrix not having been made in her presence, was the signing of S. S. Knight's signature under hers a sufficient ratification of any previous instructions to sign for her?' I am of opinion that the three first propositions are not well taken, and are overruled. As to the fourth and last proposition I am in doubt, rather inclining to sustain the position; but, as the effect would be to grant a new trial, I prefer that the supreme court pass upon this question, as in that event the case would be ended one way or the other, and therefore the motion to set aside the probate of the will is refused, and the appeal dismissed."

From this judgment the contestants appeal to this court upon numerous exceptions, fourteen in number, which are all printed in the brief; but, following the good example of the appellants' attorney, we think that they all may be considered under four general propositions, urged in the argument below to set aside the verdict of the jury and refuse probate of the will, which have already been stated in the judgment of the court. The power to direct during life how one's property shall go after death is certainly a great privilege. As was said by the court in Means v. Means, 5 Strobb. L. 190: "The right to make a will is especially valuable to the old and infirm. Their thoughts dwell most upon posthumous arrangements, and in this right they have the means, not only of gratifying their feelings, but of securing substantial advantages while they live," etc. In order to protect this valued right against fraud and imposition, the law has prescribed for the execution of wills peculiar formalities, which must be observed. Section 1854 of the General Statutes declares that "all wills and testaments of real and personal property shall be in writing, and signed by the party so devising the same, or by some other person in his presence, and by his express directions, and shall be attested and subscribed, in the presence of the said deviser, and of each other, by three or more credible witnesses, or else they shall be utterly void and of no effect." The words of this law which are in point here are identical with those in the old English statute of frauds, and have often received construction which may throw light on the inquiry here. Mrs. Bowen, the testatrix, did not sign the paper propounded as her will, but the law allowed her to execute a will, "signed by another person in her presence, and by her express directions, attested and signed by three or more subscribing witnesses in the presence of the deviser and of each other," etc.

1. The first objection to the execution is that, "as Knight signed the name of the testatrix to the paper propounded as her will, he was not a competent witness to attest her will as one of the subscribing witnesses required by law." At first some of us thought it rather an anomalous proceeding for a witness to attest a signing by himself, but Mr. Jarman explains that such a witness does not attest the signing merely, but also the directions given to sign; but, at all events, the authorities concur that, under the circumstances stated, the signer of the will is competent as one of the three subscribing witnesses required by law. See 1 Jarman, Wills, 204; Schouler, Wills, 388; Redf. Wills, 209. Mr. Redfield says: "Both the earlier and present English statute, and most of those in force in this country, allow the testator's signature to be made by some other person, if made in the presence of the testator, and by his express direction. Under this clause of the statute, it has been held that this act may be done by one of the witnesses. Indeed, it is the law in some of the states that one who has signed for the testator, at his request, must write his name as witness to the will." We think there was no error here.

2. The second proposition is that Mrs. Bowen did not give Doctor Knight "express directions" to sign her will for her. The judge charged that it was a question of fact, to be decided by the jury; saying that the "plaintiffs' attorney contended that Mrs. Bowen need not have said in articulate words, 'Doctor Knight, you must sign that paper for me;' and that is the right contention. It is sufficient if the whole conversations that occurred between the testatrix and Dr. Knight amounted to an express declaration, it should be construed into 'an express direction' to sign the paper." As we understand it, a simple question and answer may amount to a declaration. We cannot suppose that the word "express" was intended to be limited necessarily to an expression in words. We take it that one perfectly dumb, and unable to speak a word, may in some way indicate his desire, so as to come within the provision of the law, as to giving direction; as some one has tersely put it, "a direction in fact, but not in words." But, taking both conversations of the parties together,—that of the afternoon, when Dr. Knight was requested to write the will, and that at night, when they were about to execute it,—we think that the judge committed no error on this point. There is no evidence that Dr. Knight was a volunteer in the matter.

3. The next proposition is that "the will was not signed in the presence of Mrs. Bowen, the testatrix, and the signing of S. S. Knight's name under hers was not a sufficient ratification of any previous instructions to sign for her." The judge charged: "If you find that S. S. Knight did not write or sign Mrs. Bowen's name to the paper propounded as her will in her presence, then it was not duly executed, under the law, unless he then and there adopted it by signing his name as agent in the presence of the other witnesses." Under the charge the jury must have found that Knight wrote the words "By S. S. Knight, by request," under the name of "Emeline Bowen," already in the will, thereby adopting the name previously written by himself, and that this was done at the time the will was executed, in the presence of the testatrix and the witnesses. Assuming, then, that the name of the testatrix was written on the will in the afternoon, and not rewritten at the time of execution, it is very clear that her written name, no matter when or where made, was not an accomplished act, but only preparatory to something else, to give it vitality. At first the appending of "her mark" by Mrs. Bowen was intended, which would certainly have adopted it, no matter when written, but afterwards changed to "another person signing for her by request." Standing alone, it was a perfect nullity, and might have been stricken out, as a word incorrectly used. As it seems to us, it is not a question of ratification by Mrs. Bowen, for she did not know that in preparing her will her name had been written in it, but rather a question of adoption by Knight, as a part of his signing by request. Neither the law nor the testatrix directed Knight how he was to sign, and we cannot see why he might not adopt her name, previously written by himself, as he could then have run his pen through the name, and have rewritten it then and there. But if in this we are in error, if, from the nature of the subject, Knight could not adopt the name of Mrs. Bowen, standing on the draft of the will, so as to be a compliance with the law, which requires that the signing by "another person" must be in the presence of the testator, etc., was it indispensable to the execution that the "other person" deputed to sign for Mrs. Bowen should, in doing so, set out her name? It will be observed that the law does not so require, and, as it seems, the signing by "another person" is not confined only to the name of the testatrix. All the authorities agree that a will may be executed without the name of the deviser appearing on its face. It has often been decided that a mark, without the name itself, is sufficient, and, of course, the initials of testator's name would also suffice (see Ray v. Hill, 8 Strobb. L. 803, 49 Am. Dec. 647, and Adams v. Chaplin, 1 Hill, Eq. 265); and the will may be signed by another person for the testator. "That 'other person,' as it seems, may be one of the witnesses, and it is immaterial that he signed his own name, instead of the name of the testator; and, when the testator directed a person to sign the will for him, which that person did by writing at the foot 'This will was read and approved by C. F. B., by C. C., in the presence of' etc., and then followed the signature of the witnesses, the will was held good," etc. The following form of subscription is sufficient: "E. N., for R. D., at her request." "So, also, where the testator's name was subscribed, at his request, by one of the subscribing witnesses." See 1 Jarman, Wills, p. 79, and Redf. Wills, 205, and numerous cases in the notes; and also 1 Wms. Exrs., p. 83. But, be this as it may, we cannot say it was error to hold that, under the authority given him by the testatrix to sign for her, S. S. Knight sufficiently signed for her on Sunday night, at the time the will was executed, in the presence of the testatrix and of the subscribing witnesses.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and the case be remanded to the probate court of Laurens county, for such further proceedings as may be deemed proper and necessary to carry out the conclusions herein announced.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Joseph A. FREDERICKS, Appt.;
v.
NORTHERN CENTRAL R. CO.

1. A passenger injured in a collision of cars on the railroad is entitled to the benefit of a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier.
2. A railroad company is not liable for an injury to a passenger caused by the grossly criminal act of a stranger in letting off the brakes on loaded cars standing on a switch and closing the switch, which had been left open to derail the cars if they got loose, on account of which the cars run down grade and out on the main track causing a collision, where there was no negligence in failing to discover the mischief or prevent its effect.
3. It is not error for the judge to express an opinion on the question whether a railroad company had been guilty of negligence in respect to loaded cars left on a switch, which was left open so as to derail them if they got loose, where the circumstances call for words of caution from him, because of a collision due to the criminal act of a stranger, and the jury are told that it is for them to decide the whole matter.

(October 2, 1898.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas No. 4, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff while a passenger on defendant's road, and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. John R. Adams and Samuel B. Huey, for appellant:

As to railway companies, they contract to carry passengers safely, and the slightest degree of neglect against which human foresight and prudence may guard, and by which hurt or loss is occasioned, will render them liable to answer in damages.

The defendants had notice that this locality was infested by boys, because it was in the neighborhood of miners' houses.

Extraordinary care with reference to the NOTE.—Liability of railroad for accidents caused by wrongful act of stranger.

A railroad company is not liable to passengers for accidents caused by torts of third persons tampering with the rails or switches, where the company has exercised due care in operating the road. Keeley v. Erie R. Co. 47 How. Pr. 256; Worth v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 51 Fed. Rep. 171; Latch v. Rumner R. Co. 3 Hurst. & N. 930, 27 L. J. Exch. 155; Deyo v. New York Cent. R. Co. 34 N. Y. 2.

The same doctrine is announced in Curtis v. Rochester & S. R. Co., 18 N. Y. 584, 75 Am. Dec. 253, but in that case the plaintiff's verdict was sustained because the evidence tended to show that the cause of the injury was negligence in condition of the track.

Nor is it liable to injured employés for accidents from the same cause. Miller v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 20 Or. 235; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane, post, 515.

In Deyo v. New York Cent. R. Co., supra, evidence of threats against the company was admitted to show warning and necessity of care to be taken by the company. In Worth v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., supra, evidence of other obstructions and threats against the company was allowed on behalf of the defendant to show a motive of wrongdoing; but in Miller v. Southern Pac. R. Co., supra, the court refused to admit the confession of a criminal convicted of derailing the train, as evidence to relieve the company of responsibility as he was not a party; and in East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane, supra, the fact that the company had not recovered its switch key from a discharged employé was not negligence per se.

And the company is not liable to a passenger injured by the explosion of a fog signal placed on the track by some party unknown. Jones v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 45 U. C. Q. B. 193.

So where a passenger is injured by a missile, which is not thrown by some one connected with 22 L. R. A.

the operation of the road, the company is not liable. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. MacKinney, 2 L. R. A. 820, 124 Pa. 463; Thomas v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 15 L. R. A. 410, 148 Pa. 180.

And a railroad company is not required to have its car windows covered with wire screens to keep out missiles thrown by trespassers. Missimer v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 17 Phila. 172, 42 Phila. Leg. Int. 405.

And is not liable if an engine placed on a side-track with its fires banked was started by some unknown wrongdoer, causing a collision, but would be liable if it started itself. Mars v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 54 Hun. 625.

And is not liable where a female passenger entered a car standing on a gravity track, knowing the proper time had not yet arrived when a brakeman would take charge of the car, and a small boy unlocked the brakes and she was injured jumping from the car. Western Maryland R. Co. v. Herold, 14 L. R. A. 75, 74 Md. 510.

A mining company is not liable where such company ran its cars down a siding on to a track against cars from which the brakes had been removed by a wrongdoer, causing them to run against a car in which plaintiff was working injuring him, although the brakes had been removed on prior occasions. EBright v. Mineral R. & Min. Co. (Pa.) Oct. 1, 1898.

So a railroad company is not responsible to an injured passenger for leaving an unlocked hand-car near the track which some one placed on the track causing a collision, unless the company was bound to apprehend that it would be placed on the track and would cause injury. Harris v. Union Pac. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 501, 4 McCrary, 454.

In this note injuries to trespassers as in the turntable cases, have been omitted. As to liability for injuries to children trespassing on turntable, see note to Fort Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Robertson (Tex.) 14 L. R. A. 781, 1 L. T.

switch certainly included more than merely leaving it open. Had the track been perfectly level the switch ought to have been opened, to protect the main line from the danger of cars left there being pushed or bumped upon it by engines or moving cars in the rear. Extraordinary care with reference to the switch could not stop short of a lock.

There can be no cause connected with the management of defendant's cars, rails, brakes, or switches so remote that the law requiring extraordinary care does not apply.

The charge was partial and controlling on the minds of the jury.

Mr. George Tucker Bispham, for appellee:

The mere happening of an injurious accident, if it arises from something connected with the means of transportation, or from something over which the railroad company has control, makes out a prima facie case, but not otherwise.

Thomas v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 30 W. N. C. 9; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. MacKinney, 2 L. R. A. 820, 124 Pa. 463.

A railroad company is not bound to anticipate and take precautions against trespasses by third parties.

Ibid.

The presumption of law is that crime will not be committed, and that persons will act with ordinary prudence.

Daniel v. Metropolitan R. Co. L. R. 5 Eng. & Ir. App. 61.

In Litch v. Rumner R. Co., 3 Hurlst. & N. 980, it was held that although the derailment of a train was prima facie evidence of negligence, yet it was entirely rebutted by proof that the derailment was caused by the act of a stranger.

In Ebright v. Mineral R. & Min. Co., 3 Pa. Supreme Court Digest, 281, the defendant, a railroad company, was held not liable for a collision which took place in consequence of the brakes of the cars having been removed by a trespasser.

See also Worth v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 51 Fed. Rep. 171.

There was an efficient intervening agency between the acts alleged as negligence upon the part of the defendant and the happening of the accident, and under the decisions of this court it is submitted that this reduces any alleged negligence on the part of the defendant from a proximate to a remote cause, and relieves it from liability therefor.

Schaeffer v. Jackson Twp. 18 L. R. A. 100, 160 Pa. 151; Herr v. Lebanon, 80 W. N. C. 248.

The court was asked to pass upon the question of proximate or remote cause as a question of law. It is believed that to do so was right.

South Side Pass. R. Co. v. Trich, 117 Pa. 390.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is not the least question as to how the collision occurred which resulted in the plaintiff's injury. Two loaded coal cars, which had been standing on a side track, at 23 L. R. A.

a distance of almost two miles from the place of collision, were detached from a number of other cars to which they were coupled. A throw-off switch which would have derailed the cars if left undisturbed was closed so as to lead the cars on the side track, down a moderate grade, until it joined the main track. There the cars collided with a miners' train on which the plaintiff was riding as a passenger, and killed two persons and injured others, among whom was the plaintiff. The coal cars, which had attained a very high speed, ran into the miners' train from behind, and drove the forward car, on which the plaintiff was riding, into the tender and engine. The plaintiff was a passenger, and was injured without any fault of his own. As the injury was inflicted by a collision of other cars and on the track of the defendant company, he was entitled to, and received, the benefit of the legal presumption that the injury was the consequence of the defendant's negligence, which presumption it was the defendant's duty to rebut, or suffer a recovery of damages by the plaintiff. The only substantial question in the case was whether the presumption of negligence was rebutted by the evidence. That question was left to the jury by the learned court below, and the jury found that it was, by returning a verdict in favor of the defendant. It is difficult to see how any other verdict could have been returned consistently with the testimony. The evidence, which was entirely uncontradicted, showed that a small train consisting of four loaded and six or seven empty coal cars was taken up the Northern Central track over on the side track, which belonged to the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, but was used by the defendant, at about half past 10 o'clock in the morning. The engine was detached from the train, and the cars were left standing on the side track, and remained there during the day. The loaded cars were in front. There was a throw-off switch on the track upon which the cars were left standing, a short distance below the cars. The conductor, Linderman, was asked: "Question. Tell the jury what you did with the draught of cars when you got up there; whether any of the brakes were put on, and whether anything was done to the shut-off switch. Tell us first about the brakes. Answer. The brakes were put on by the men, and I threw the throw-off switch back personally myself when the engine run back over it. Q. You left the cars standing there, did you? A. Yes, sir. Q. You went back with the engine? A. Yes, sir. Q. Of course the throw-off switch was closed when the engine went over it? A. Yes, sir. Q. After the engine passed over it, who threw the throw-off switch? A. I did."

The fireman of the train, Joseph A. Eadie, having testified that he was on the train, and that they took the cars to the point stated by Linderman, above the throw-off switch, was asked: "Question. After you got the draught of cars up there, did you do anything to the brakes? Answer. I set three brakes. Q. On what cars? A. On the first and second; two on the first and one on the second car. Q.

Were those the cars that were nearest to the locomotive? A. Yes, sir. Q. Those were the two loaded cars, were they? A. They were. Q. Were the cars coupled together? A. Yes sir. Q. Were they left coupled? A. They were. Q. The entire draught was left coupled? A. They were all left coupled that we took up there. . . . Q. Did you leave on the locomotive with the engineer and conductor? A. I did. Q. And the rest of the crew? A. Yes, sir. Q. You left the cars standing there. A. Yes, sir. Q. What was done to the throw-off switch? A. The conductor threw the throw-off switch back. Q. Was that before or after the locomotive had passed over it? A. After it passed over it. Q. After it was thrown, the switch was open? A. It was. Q. If the cars had started to run down in that position they would have been thrown into the meadow by the miners' houses, would they not? A. Yes, sir."

W. L. Eadie, a brakeman, having testified that he was on the cars as brakeman, that the cars were left standing on the track above the throw-off switch, and that he went back on the engine with the others, was asked: "Question. After the engine had passed this throw-off switch, did you notice the conductor do anything? Answer. Yes, sir; he threw the throw-off switch open. Q. You were with him when he did that, were you? A. Yes, sir; him and I were on the point together after he did it. Q. The switch was open when you left? A. Yes, sir."

The testimony of the foregoing witnesses proves that the two cars that escaped were duly braked, by setting both brakes on the front one and one brake on the rear one, and also that the throw-off switch below the cars was thrown open, and that, if left in that condition, the cars, if started, could not run on the track, but would be thrown off in the meadow. Other brakes were set on the other cars, but it is not necessary to recur to that testimony, because their sufficiency to hold the cars was conclusively established by the fact that they did hold them. They did not leave, but remained standing where they were placed after the two loaded cars had been detached and left.

The question whether the precautions taken by the defendant's men were sufficient to hold the cars in place was fully illustrated by the testimony of F. W. Monier, who was shipping clerk of the Excelsior colliery, which was further up the track, and above the cars. He testified that he saw the cars in the morning, and again in the afternoon. He was asked: "Question. When did you examine the throw-off switch? Answer. In the afternoon, about half past four or five o'clock. Q. That was before the cars ran away? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was the condition of the throw-off switch then,—was it open or closed? A. It was open. Q. So that, if the cars had been started, and the switch in that condition, they would have been ditched? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you take notice of the condition of the brakes on this draught of coal cars? A. I did. Q. Did you notice the condition of the brakes in the afternoon? A. I only noticed the condition of the brake about half past four or five o'clock. Q. Please tell the jury what condition you found the brakes in; whether you examined the brakes, and why you did it, and what condition you found the brakes in at half past four o'clock in the afternoon. A. I examined the first three brakes on the train nearest to the throw-off switch. I found the brakes set. Q. Were they set hard or tight? A. Yes, sir; the brakes were set very tight. I could not make them any tighter. I tried to tighten the brakes up tighter. The brakes were set tight enough to hold the cars. The switch was set to throw the cars off in case anything would happen to them. Q. The brakes that were set, were they on the car nearest to the switch? A. The first three brakes; yes, sir. The two brakes in the first car and the first brake on the second car were set. Q. Did you look at the brakes yourself? A. Yes, sir; I examined the brakes. The brakes were all right."

The testimony of the last witness shows the condition of the cars, the brakes, and the switch at nearly, or quite, 5 o'clock in the afternoon. The cars were in the same position as when they were left by the crew in the morning at 11 o'clock. The brakes on the two cars in question were in the same condition as then,—they were set tight, and held the cars. The throw-off switch was open, as it was left in the morning, so that, if the cars had started, they would not have run down the track, but would have been derailed on the meadow. The absolute sufficiency of the precautions taken was conclusively proved by the fact that they did prevent the cars from starting, and made it impossible for them to run down the track if they had started. It cannot, therefore, be argued that they were insufficient. The jury has found that the defendant did its whole duty in the way of precautions, and was not guilty of any negligence which led to the collision.

The manner in which the collision was produced was fully shown by the evidence, which was entirely uncontradicted. Between 5 and 6 o'clock on the same afternoon a boy named John McCoskey got on the cars between the second and third cars, and was seen hammering at the ratchet wheel of the brake with a coupling pin which he had in his hands. A very few minutes before he got on the cars he turned the throw-off switch in front of the cars so as to close it, and let the cars run down on the track. He hammered at the cog which holds the brake for a minute or so, until he got it loose, when the cars started on the track. Three boys testified to seeing this, and one of them—Alexander Smoogen—jumped on the cars and tried to stop them with the brakes, but did not succeed, and he then jumped off to save himself. The cars ran on down the side track, and on to the main track, where they collided with the miners' train, and did their dreadful work. There is not the least dispute as to this state of facts, and the jury confirmed it by their verdict. It will thus be seen that the collision was produced by the criminal trespass of a stranger to the defendant company, for whose acts they were not in the least degree responsible, and over whom they had no control. The offense of which the boy McCoskey was guilty in misplacing the switch was a most atrocious and abominable crime, for which, under the Crimes Act of 1860, he was liable to a fine of $10,000, and an imprisonment at labor for ten years. By the Law of May 26, 1891 (Pub. Laws, 121), the penalty for the same offense, when it results in death, is a conviction of murder.

The question in this case is whether the defendant company was bound, in the exercise of its duty of extraordinary care, to take extraordinary precautions against the grossly criminal acts of strangers. That it did take amply sufficient precautions against everything short of the grievous crime of misplacing a switch is conclusively established by the uncontradicted evidence in the case and by the verdict of the jury. The learned court below did, with some well-founded hesitancy, commit to the jury the question of the defendant's negligence in the precautions it took. It was argued in the lower court, as here, that the defendant might have opened the lower switch, or put locks on the switches, and therefore they did not exercise the very highest degree of care which was possible to human skill, prudence, and foresight. But this argument overlooks the fact that the upper switch was left open, which made it impossible for the cars to get to the lower switch, and the further fact that any person who would misplace a switch would break a lock, if it were there. But the argument is fatally defective in that it is founded upon the theory that transporting companies are legally bound to take precautions against the criminal acts of strangers, and are responsible for such acts if they do not. We have not been referred to any case, and we know of none, in which such doctrine has ever been held. In the case of Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummel, 44 Pa. 875, 84 Am. Dec. 457, this court said: "If the law declares—as it does—that there is no duty resting upon any person to anticipate wrongful acts in others, and to take precautions against such acts, then the jury cannot say that a failure to take such precautions is a failure in duty, and negligence. . . . Were it worth while, abundant authority might be cited to show that the law does not require any one to presume that another may be negligent, much less to presume that another may be an active wrongdoer. . . . It is too well founded in reason, however, to need authority. We act upon it constantly, and without it there could be no freedom of action." The rule that the carrier is bound to exercise the highest degree of care that is possible to human foresight and prudence does not require a construction that will make the carrier an insurer against accidents; nor the prevention of accidents by the employment of means which, if the accident could have been foretold, might have been used to prevent it; nor for the wrongful acts of strangers, unless the carrier was remiss in not discovering them in time to avert the injury; nor for an impracticable character or extent of precaution which could not be observed without so ruinous a cost as to destroy the business; and in all cases the liability is only such as results from negligence.

Our own cases illustrate all these qualifications of the rule of highest possible care. Thus in Meier v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 64 Pa. 225, 3 Am. Rep. 581, the plaintiff's injury was sustained while he was a passenger on a sleeping car in consequence of the breaking of the axle of the forward truck in two places. The end of the car then dropped down and slid along the rails. The plaintiff was thrown forward, the ligaments of the right knee were torn, and the bones of his leg were severely bruised. The plaintiff was entirely without fault, and the accident was the result of a defect in the axle. Of course, the presumption of negligence arose, and the defendant undertook to rebut it by proving that new wheels and axles had been put on a few months before, and that they were of good quality; that they were constantly inspected; that the road was in good order, and the train running at proper speed; and that they had employed such appliances as were approved by the most experienced railroad operators and mechanics. The case was tried in the district court of Philadelphia by the very able and distinguished Judge Thayer, then of that court, who submitted the question of negligence to the jury in a lucid and exhaustive charge, which received the full approbation of this court. The verdict was for the defendant. The plaintiff sued out a writ of error, and assigned portions of the charge, which qualified, or rather carefully stated, the rule of highest possible care; but this court approved his rulings, and sustained the judgment. The following language of the charge was assigned for error: "That common carriers of passengers are liable only for negligence. They are not insurers of the safety of their passengers, like common carriers of goods. . . . But common carriers of passengers are not liable for injuries happening to passengers from unforeseen accidents, where there has been no negligence. They do not undertake absolutely to be responsible for unavoidable accidents,—for accidents, in a word, which are not the result of their own negligence." Concerning this part of the charge, Mr. Justice Agnew, delivering the opinion of this court, said: "It is agreed on all hands, says Judge Redfield, in his work on Railways (ed. 1867, p. 174), that carriers of passengers are liable only for negligence, either proximate or remote, and that they are not insurers of the safety of their passengers, as they are as carriers of goods and baggage of passengers. The numerous cases cited from which this result is drawn justifies this statement. . . . In all the Pennsylvania cases it will be found that negligence is the ground of liability on the part of a carrier of passengers. Absolute liability requires absolute perfection in machinery in all respects, which is impossible." Judge Thayer also charged: "(2) That the rule in regard to carriers of passengers is this: The utmost care and vigilance is required on the part of the carrier. The rule does not require the utmost degree of care which the human mind is capable of imagining, but it does require that the highest degree of practicable care and diligence should be adopted that is consistent with the mode of transportation adopted. Railway passenger carriers are bound to use all reasonable precautions against injury of passengers, and these precautions are to be measured by those in known use in the same business which have been proved by experience to be efficacious. The company are bound to use the best precautions in known practical use. That is the rule; the best precautions in known practical use to secure the safety of the passengers; but not every possible preventive which the highest scientific skill might suggest." In regard to this part of the charge we said: "The rule laid down by the learned judge in the language quoted in the second assignment is a correct summary of the law. The rule of responsibility differs from the rule of evidence. Prima facie, where a passenger, being carried on a train, is injured without fault of his own, there is a legal presumption of negligence casting upon the carrier the onus of disproving it [citing several cases]. This is the rule when the injury is caused by a defect in the road, cars, or machinery, or by a want of diligence or care in those employed, or by any other thing which the company can and ought to control as a part of its duty to carry the passengers safely. But this rule of evidence is not conclusive. The carrier may rebut the presumption, and relieve himself from responsibility, by showing that the injury arose from an accident which the utmost skill, foresight, and diligence could not prevent. . . . To ask more is to prohibit the running of railways, unless they possess a capital and surplus which will enable them to add a new element to their business,—that of insurance."

It will be observed that the rulings of the court below were approved in a case in which the passenger was injured while traveling on the defendant's car, without any fault of his own, and where the cause of his injury was a defect in one of the axles of the car, in consequence of which it broke. An appliance was defective and the defendant was relieved from liability, although the defect was not discovered, and the rule of highest skill, foresight, and diligence was held not to be infringed by the nondiscovery of the defect.

How much stronger is the present case. Here the injury was not the result of any defect in any of the appliances used by the defendant, nor by any want of skill, foresight, and diligence which was humanly possible. The injury was not the result of any act of carelessness or negligence on the part of anybody. It was the result, exclusively, of a deliberate, intended, willful, affirmative, positive act of criminal trespass. No mere act of carelessness or negligence could have turned over the switch, which was set to derail the cars, so that it would throw the cars on the track instead of off. No mere act of carelessness or negligence could or would have taken out the coupling pin which held the cars together. No mere act of carelessness or negligence could or would have driven back the ratchet which held the brakes in place,—four of them in all,—so as to set the cars in motion. All and every one of these acts required special physical effort, exerted for the very purpose of releasing the cars from the entirely sufficient restraints which had been imposed upon them by the company's agents, and these efforts were made each one after the other, in a wicked and deadly succession, until the horrible purpose was accomplished, and the work of death and destruction resulted. How can it be said that any human skill, foresight, or diligence could have divined or believed or imagined that such acts would have been perpetrated? It would require a gift of omniscience to foresee them, a gift of prophecy to foretell them, and neither of these qualities is human. It is useless to say that additional precautions might have been taken. So they might, if the possibility of such acts could have been known in advance. A force of men might have been stationed at the cars to prevent the possibility of another force of men invading them and setting them loose, but such transactions are outside the pale of human experience, and it is simply preposterous to say that the omission to take that kind of precaution is negligence in any conceivable aspect of the case. Placing blocks under the wheels and locks on the switches avails nothing against the deliberate, willful, and intended purpose to set free loaded cars in such circumstances as these. The same purpose which would turn over the switch, take out the coupling pin, and then hammer at the brakes until they were opened, would remove the blocks from the wheels and shatter the lock on the switch. But it is not one or another particular act of precaution the want of which is to be set up as a test of the legal duty of precaution, but the whole criminal purposes ought to be accomplished. If that purpose and corresponding action were such as not to subject the defendant to a duty of precaution against it, the presence of some precautions, and the absence of another, which might or might not have been effective, or might have been more effective than those that were observed, is of no moment in the consideration of the general question as to the existence of the legal duty. If the purpose and the act were criminal, and were those of a stranger, and could not have been foreseen by any human skill or knowledge, the duty of precaution against such acts does not arise, and negligence does not result from the want of such precautions. The rule of highest skill, care, and prudence does not require the impossible, or the very extreme of care and precaution that can be imagined. In Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (sec. 266) it is thus expressed: "This doctrine is not to be construed as meaning that the carrier must adopt all the precautions that an ingenious mind could suggest, or have all the skill that science could give, nor that he must use all the precaution which, after an accident has happened, it can be seen would have sufficed to avoid it, nor even that he must use such precautions as one would use who knew beforehand that the accident would otherwise certainly occur." Again, at section

370, the writer says: "A railroad company is certainly not liable for an injury arising from a break in its tracks, caused by a sudden and extraordinary flood, or by the willful act of a stranger, unless the injury happens to a train which the servants of the company run upon the broken road after they, or those who ought to advise them, have had notice of its condition, or have had sufficient opportunity to learn it." In 2 Wood's Railway Law, at section 302, the writer, presenting the subject in words nearly identical with the foregoing, continues: "The law does not require such particular precaution as, it is apparent after the accident, might have prevented the injury, but such as would be dictated by the utmost care and prudence of a very cautious person before the accident, and without knowledge that it was about to occur. The defendant must use the highest degree of practicable care and diligence that is consistent with the mode of transportation adopted." This was the precise language of the court in the case of Bowen v. New York Cent. R. Co., 18 N. Y. 408, 72 Am. Dec. 529. The rule is stated in the same way in Redfield on Carriers (sec. 347 and note 19). The rule is stated in substantially the same way in 2 Rorer on Railroads (p. 955), thus: "But this rule of greatest possible care is not to be understood as requiring the utmost degree of care which the human mind can attain to or is capable of inventing. Such applications of it would involve such an expenditure as would tend to prevent all persons of ordinary prudence from engaging in the business. It simply means greatest degree of care that is consistent with that mode of transportation. It does not contemplate such a measure of care as will render it practically impossible to continue the railroad transportation of passengers. They are by no means insurers of human life, and are not accountable for the results of latent defects which the usual and well-recognized tests of science and art fail to detect; nor are they liable for accidents which skill and experience are unable to foresee and avoid."

The very question which arises in this case was decided in Deyo v. New York Cent. R. Co., 34 N. Y. 9. The plaintiff was a passenger on the railroad of the defendant at night. "The train was thrown from the track through the culpable act of some unknown person, who maliciously or mischievously drew the spikes which fastened the chairs and the rails. Marks were visible on the ties of a claw bar having been used in removing these spikes. Two trains had passed over this section of the road at the point where the injury happened. . . . The road was in good condition when these trains passed over it in safety and without any obstruction." Davies, J., in delivering the opinion, said: "The only question upon this appeal is whether there was any evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants or their servants sufficient to warrant the learned justice who tried the action in submitting that question to the jury. It is a familiar principle that carriers of passengers are not insurers of the safety of their passengers. Their duty is measured by the dangers which attend railroad carriage; and the utmost foresight as to possible dangers, and the utmost prudence in guarding against them are required to exempt them from liability in case of injury to a passenger. . . .

There was no evidence in this action of any negligence on the part of the defendants, their servants or agents. This portion of the track was laid with the best and most improved rail. It was in perfect order. It had been passed over by their track-master a few hours before the accident. Within two hours before it occurred three trains of cars had passed over it in safety, and it must then have been in complete order. The proximate cause of the accident was the removal of the spikes which fastened the chairs and rails to the ties and sleepers. It is apparent that, as soon as these fastenings were removed, a superincumbent pressure would displace the rails, and thus inevitably throw the cars off the track. No human care or foresight could guard against such a diabolical act, committed under the circumstances developed in this case. It is clear that these fastenings must have been removed after the last train going east had passed the point where the road was disturbed." The court below had on the trial granted a compulsory nonsuit, and the court of appeals affirmed the judgment, saying: "If, therefore, the jury on this testimony had found that the defendant had been guilty of negligence, it would have been the duty of the court to have set aside the verdict."

It will be observed that in the case just cited there was no affirmative proof as to who removed the spikes, and thus caused the rails to become displaced. There was, therefore, a possibility that they might have been removed by some vindictive employé who had been discharged. In fact, there was evidence to prove just such a state of facts, but nevertheless the court held that the company was not liable. But in the case at bar there was full proof that the cars were uncoupled and the brakes loosened, and the switch turned back, by a person who was a total stranger, and having nothing to do with the defendant company, and for whose acts, therefore, the company was not responsible in any conceivable manner.

The case of Curtis v. Rochester & S. R. Co., 18 N. Y. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 258, is another instance in which the same doctrine of non-liability was held, although there the evidence was sufficient to warrant a verdict of negligence. The plaintiff was a passenger, and was injured by the car running off the track at a switch at a station, which was misplaced, on the main track. There was no evidence to show how it became misplaced, and as it was at a station there was sufficient evidence of want of care to carry the case to the jury. But the court of appeals, in their comments upon the rule of duty applicable in such cases, said: "Carriers of passengers are not insurers, and many injuries may occur to those they transport for which they are not responsible. They are, for obvious reasons, held bound to exert the utmost care and vigilance to secure the safety of passengers, and are responsible for the slightest negligence. But injuries may often happen through the fault or misconduct of those whose acts are in no way chargeable to them.

Still accidents may occur from a multitude of causes, even upon a railroad, for which the company is not responsible. If obstructions are placed by strangers upon the road, either through accident or design, the company is not responsible for the consequences, unless its agents have been remiss in not discovering them."

That is precisely this case. These cars were in a place of safety, and amply secured against either leaving their position or running on the main track, by a switch, so as to derail them if they did get loose. But they were detached from the other cars, their brakes were opened, and the derailing switch turned back by one who was a stranger; and within a very few minutes after this was done the collision occurred. There was no time for the defendant's agents to discover the mischief, and they cannot be charged with negligence in that respect. So far as this defendant is concerned, it is of no consequence who it was that committed this crime, nor what his motives were. He was a stranger, over whom they had no control, and they were not responsible for his acts.

In two of our recent cases the rule of the presumption of negligence from the mere fact that the plaintiff was a passenger, and was injured, has received qualifications which are strictly applicable to the case at bar. The first of them is Pennsylvania R. Co. v. MacKinney, 124 Pa. 462, 2 L. R. A. 820, in which the plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's train, and, while reading a newspaper in his seat at an open window, was struck in the eye by a hard substance, and seriously injured. On the trial the court below instructed the jury that they should start with the presumption that the defendant was guilty of negligence from the mere happening of the accident, and that it thereupon devolved upon the defendant to rebut that presumption, and show that they were not negligent. We held that this was error, because the accident occurred from something extraneous to the railroad and the appliances of travel, and it would be necessary for the plaintiff to go further, and affirmatively prove that there was negligence. The present chief justice, in delivering the opinion, pointed out the difference between an accident resulting from the mere operation of the road and one which was the result of some extrinsic cause. In the former the presumption of negligence arose from the mere happening of the accident; in the latter no such presumption arose, and the fact of negligence for which the defendant was responsible must be proved by satisfactory testimony, just as in any ordinary case between strangers. Concluding, he said: "If the case had been submitted to the jury on the evidence, and they had found therefrom that the plaintiff's injury resulted from something connected with the operation of the railroad, and not from something entirely disconnected therewith, and with which neither the company nor its employés had anything whatever to do, that would have raised prima facie a presumption of negligence on the part of the company, and thrown upon it the burden of proving that it did not exist."

In the present case, the injury having occurred as the result of a collision of cars on the railroad, the plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of a presumption of negligence, and the court below so charged the jury. But the defendant met and rebutted that presumption by showing conclusively, and without the least contradiction, that the collision was occasioned solely by the criminal act of a stranger, with whom neither the company nor its agents had anything to do. As this was an undisputed fact, it is almost impossible to understand why the learned court below would not have been justified in withdrawing the case from the jury, as was done in the case of Deyo v. New York Cent. R. Co., supra, on the ground that upon the whole testimony no negligence was shown for which the defendant was responsible. But the learned court left that question to the jury, and the jury found that the defendant was not guilty of any negligence which produced the injury, and that verdict, of course, settles the question.

The appellant claims that the court below did not dwell with sufficient force and emphasis upon the rule of the highest degree of care, skill, and prudence which was humanly possible. It is sufficient to say in reply that, in view of the entirely uncontradicted testimony in this case, it was only necessary to inquire whether the defendant had rebutted the presumption of negligence which arose from the mere facts of the injury. There was nothing in the case but the mere presumption. All of the actual testimony as to the real facts of the occurrence tended in a most eminent degree to show that there was no negligence for which the company was responsible, and that the injury was the result of the willful criminal trespass of a stranger. In such circumstances the highest inquiry that could legitimately be conducted by the jury was whether there was any negligence on the part of the defendant in the precautions taken against such an accident. That question was fully submitted by the learned court to the jury, with instructions to find for the plaintiff if they found such negligence. The appellant's points on the subject of the highest possible degree of care were affirmed, and the remark of the court below, that the principle was very strongly expressed, was entirely correct in view of the manifest facts of the case. So, also, his expression of individual opinion that the precautions taken by the defendant were sufficient to relieve them of the charge of negligence was appropriate and just in view of the testimony. He distinctly told the jury it was for them to decide the question, and left them entirely free to act upon their own judgment. In the case of Latch v. Rumner R. Co., 8 Hurlst. & N. 930, the plaintiff's trucks were derailed by the misplacement of the points of a siding. There the evidence showed that shortly before the accident a stone was found inserted under the lever of one of the points, and the defendant claimed that this had caused the accident, and, as it was the willful act of a stranger, they were not responsible. The judge who tried the case thought there was no evidence of actual negligence, and told the jury that if the defendant's account was correct they were entitled to a verdict, unless the jury thought there was negligence in not having a person to take care of the points, and he said he did not think there was. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff, and on a rule for a new trial the case was heard in bank, and the rule made absolute. The court said: "There was evidence that there had been a willful act on the part of a stranger which would have caused the accident, and no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants. None was suggested, except their not having a person always at the spot to look after the 'points,' which they were not bound to have. The siding had been in that state for months, and no accident had happened. The verdict was clearly contrary to the evidence, and there must be a new trial." In this case there was no proof as to who had placed the stone under the lever, and the verdict had found negligence as a fact, but the court set it aside as unwarranted by the testimony. Our own very recent case of Thomas v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 148 Pa. 180, 15 L. R. A. 416, affords a still more striking illustration of the inapplicability of the rule of the highest possible care, in the case of an injured passenger, and of the necessity of affirmative proof of actual negligence, before a recovery could be had. The facts and the conclusions of the court are well stated in the opinion of Chief Justice Paxson: "On June 5, 1890, the appellant was a passenger on the cars of the defendant company, and in the vicinity of Pottstown was struck on the arm by a missile with sufficient force to cause a fracture thereof. It was not shown what caused the injury. The appellant did not see the missile, nor was it found in the car. There was no evidence that any one was near the train on the outside who could have inflicted the injury. This suit was brought to recover damages for the injury referred to. The theory of the appellant was that it was caused by a loose nut, thrown from one of the switches of the defendant's roadbed, over which the train was passing at the time. This was a mere theory, however, without any evidence to sustain it. The appellant contended that under such circumstances the question of the defendant's negligence should have been submitted to the jury. The court took a contrary view of the case, and directed a verdict for the defendant. This was the error assigned. . . . There was nothing in the evidence to connect the accident with any defect in the cars or machinery, the movement of the train, or in any of the appliances of transportation. There was nothing, therefore, to submit to a jury. It would be as reasonable to hold that a bullet fired into the car from without, by means of which a passenger is killed, is evidence of negligence on the part of the company." It will be seen that in this last case the rule that a presumption of negligence arises in favor of a passenger traveling on a train from the mere fact of the accident was 23 L. R. A.

refused application, and the rule that the highest possible care must be applied was denied enforcement, because there must be evidence to justify it in the intrinsic facts of the case. Neither of these rules, therefore, is of universal application, and the particular circumstances must be considered in order to determine how far they control the decision. Here the legal presumption was applied because the injury resulted from a collision of cars. But, the presumption having been fully rebutted by proof that the collision was the result solely of the criminal act of a stranger, it suffices no further purpose. Had the learned judge directed a verdict for the defendant, it is scarcely possible that we would have interfered with it. But he left the question of actual negligence to the jury, who properly decided there was none, and that is the end of the plaintiff's case. It was eminently not a case in which the jury should be fired with urgent repetition of the doctrine of legal presumption of negligence, and the rule of the highest possible human skill, foresight, and diligence, but rather one in which the precise limitations of the defendant's liability should be presented calmly and dispassionately; and this is exactly what was done.

The complaint that the judge expressed an opinion on the facts as to whether the defendant had exercised sufficient precautions is without merit. In the case of Leibig v. Steiner, 94 Pa. 466, we said: "A judge may give his opinion freely on the weight and value of evidence, for he is the best and safest adviser of the jury; but he has no authority to decide any question of fact when the party affirming it has sustained his averment by any reasonable proof. Very strong expressions of opinion on the facts are tolerated; indeed, sometimes may be necessary. . . . Exceptional cases arise where it is the duty of the judge to express his opinion of the facts, and guide the minds of the jury to a correct view of the evidence; and therefore it has been settled that when he does so without misleading or controlling them in the disposition of the facts there is no ground for reversing." In the present case the learned judge who tried it was particularly careful to say to the jury that, while personally he thought the company was not careless in not opening the lower switch or putting on locks, and that he thought the company had done all that a prudent man would do, nevertheless he left it to them to say whether there was carelessness on the part of the defendant in leaving the cars as they did. He also said that he left it to the jury to say whether the defendant was responsible for the misconduct of bad boys; that, while it was his own opinion that they were not, he was bound to leave that question to them, and did so. There is certainly no error in this. No attempt was made to control the action of the jury; the decision was left exclusively to them. The circumstances were such as to call for words of caution from the court; and the expression of an individual opinion, in view of the remarkable facts of the case, was not at all inappropriate, especially as the jury were told that it was for them to decide the whole matter. In the case of Spear v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 119 Pa. 61, we said: "The learned judge who tried this case in the court below was persuaded that the evidence given on behalf of the defendants was sufficient to rebut the presumption of negligence, and he had a right to express an opinion on that subject, but the question was not one of law for his determination. It is the right, and in some cases it becomes the duty, of a judge to express his opinion upon the character and weight of the testimony which he must submit to the jury, and it should be done in such a manner as to leave them in possession of the question that belongs to them." To the same effect is Pennsylvania Co. v. Allen, 8 Pennyp. 170. Kilpatrick v. Com., 81 Pa. 216: "A judge may rightfully express his opinion respecting the evidence, and it may sometimes be his duty to do it, yet not so as to withdraw it from the consideration and decision of the jury." Bitner v. Bitner, 65 Pa. 363: "Very strong expressions of opinion on the facts are tolerated; indeed sometimes may be necessary." In Johnston v. Com., 85 Pa. 54, 27 Am. Rep. 623, on a trial for burglary, the court in the charge said: "The commonwealth claims that evidence can establish nothing if this evidence will not establish the facts alleged in the third count; and I, for my part, cannot see how the jury can hesitate a moment to convict the prisoner on the third count." Held not to be error under the facts of the case, although it was a strong expression of opinion. See also, McClintock v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 21 W. N. C. 138; Doyle v. Union Pac. R. Co. 147 U. S. 418, 430, 37 L. ed. 223, 230. The assignments of error are all dismissed.

Sterrett, Ch. J., dissenting:

If the right of trial by jury, "as heretofore," is to "remain inviolable," it behooves us, in my judgment, to disapprove of such constraining influence as was improperly brought to bear upon the jury in this case. While the learned judge who presided at the trial rightly conceded that the case hinged on questions of fact which he could not, in any event, withdraw from the jury, he submitted them with evident reluctance, and with such an emphatic expression of his own opinion that said questions should all be determined in favor of the company defendant that it was next to impossible for the jury to discharge their duty, as the constitutional triers of fact, with that sense of unconstrained freedom which should always characterize the deliberations of every jury in such cases as this. Referring to the duty which the company as a common carrier of passengers owed to the plaintiff, and whether that duty had been properly performed, etc., he said: "Under the law applicable to this case I must submit the question to you to determine whether you find the defendant was careless in not opening the lower switch or putting on locks. Personally, if I were a juror, I would say, 'No.' If I were a jurymen, I would think that the company had done all that any prudent man would do. It braked its cars, opened the throw-off switch and left them there. But the question must be submitted to you as jurors to say whether you find it was carelessness on the part of the defendant to leave those cars there on the decline on which the cars would have run into the main road in case they had got loose." Again, he said: "There is another part of the case which is brought out with great strength under the evidence, and proved, I think, to your satisfaction,—as at least it is to mine,—that this accident was caused by the willful misconduct of certain boys; that those boys meddled with those cars and that switch, and that it was their willful misdoing that caused the accident. I leave it to you to say whether you think, under those circumstances, a company ought to be held responsible for the malicious, willful misconduct of bad boys. My own individual opinion in that case is that they ought not, but, as I am bound to leave that question to you, I do leave it to you to determine." Again, in answering defendant's fifth point, in which he was asked to say, as matter of law, that "neither the absence of a lock from the throw-off switch in the immediate vicinity of the coal cars, nor the failure to open the double rail switch, used as a throw-off, near the Corbin colliery, can be regarded as any proof of negligence on the part of the defendant," he again volunteered his own opinion on the question as one of fact, which, as he said, "must be submitted to" the jury, by saying, in substance, that the manifest acts of omission stated in the point could not be regarded as any proof of negligence. But the learned judge's oft-repeated declarations of his own opinion on questions of fact which were exclusively for the consideration and determination of the jury, and what he would do if he were a juror, etc., are not all. There are grave errors of law for which alone the judgment should be reversed. In the paragraph first above quoted from the charge the standard of duty applied to defendant company as a common carrier of passengers is ordinary care merely, viz.: "If I were a jurymen, I would think that the company had done all that any prudent man would do. It braked its cars, opened the throw-off switch, and left them there." It is no compliment, even to an ordinarily prudent man, to say that he would not have done more than brake the cars in such a way that even children could at any time start them down grade on their death-dealing errand, or open the throw-off switch, and leave the lever unlocked and unsecured in any manner, so that any thoughtless or mischievous boy could start it again with perfect ease. But when we apply to defendant's conduct, in leaving the coal cars in such an insecure condition, etc., the high standard of care which the law requires carriers of passengers to exercise, how widely different is the case? The contract to carry implies that every precaution which human skill could suggest has been taken to guard against every apparent danger that may beset the passenger, and that the same degree of care will continue to be exercised until he reaches the end of his journey. The siding or branch on which the coal cars stood was of unusually heavy grade, descending rapidly to its junction with the main line, on which was the train in which plaintiff and other passengers were being transported. As a necessary precaution against the danger of cars escaping by accident or otherwise and running down on to the main line, the two throw-off switches were constructed; one near the point where the coal cars stood, and the double-rail switch further down. The former was opened, as is alleged, but left unlocked, and without any kind of fastening. The latter was not even opened. If it had been, the escaping coal cars would have been arrested by it in their downward course. If the upper switch, alleged to have been opened, had been locked, or otherwise securely fastened, the danger of its being opened would certainly have been greatly lessened. The omission to even open the lower switch, and to use proper means to prevent the closing of the upper one, were certainly evidence of culpable negligence on the part of the company. The construction of these throw-off switches is proof of their necessity; but if they were not used, or not properly secured, of what avail could they be in averting danger? It is too plain to admit of any doubt that even suggesting to the jury that these acts of omission should not be regarded as any proof of negligence was error.

The unqualified affirmance of defendant's second point was plain error. In affirming that point, without any qualification or explanation, the learned judge instructed the jury, in the words thereof, thus: "The uncontradicted testimony on the part of the defendant shows that the proximate cause of the collision in which the plaintiff was injured was the wrongful act of trespassers upon defendant's cars. For such wrongful act the company defendant, under the circumstances of the present case, is not responsible; and if the jury believe the said testimony as to the proximate cause of the collision their verdict should be for defendant." The vice of this instruction is that it ignores the question of defendant's omission to exercise that high degree of care which the law requires. It was clearly the duty of the company to take every precaution which human skill and foresight could suggest to guard against every apparent danger that might beset the plaintiff and other passengers. It foresaw the danger of cars being detached, by accident or otherwise, and running down the heavy grade, uncontrolled, onto the main track; and it accordingly provided the two throw-off switches to guard against that apparent danger, but it omitted to properly use the means which it had provided expressly for that purpose. It omitted even to open one of the switches, and left the other insecurely opened. That omission was at least such evidence of negligence as would have warranted the jury in finding that its neglect of duty was the cause of the collision.

There was also error in affirming defendant's first point as presented. Other errors of minor importance might be noted, but these to which special reference has been made are sufficient to show that a fair trial was not accorded to plaintiff. The emphatic and oft-repeated expressions of opinion, etc., above referred to, were unwarranted, misleading, and erroneous. They were an uncalled-for invasion of the province of the jury. The line of demarcation between the duty of the court, as expounder of the law, and that of the jury, as the constitutional triers of fact, should be carefully observed. While, on the one hand, the court should not permit the jury to disregard or evade its instructions as to matters of law, it should be equally careful not to invade the province of the jury, and take upon itself the determination of questions of fact about which there is any doubt or dispute. For the reasons above suggested the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

EAST TENNESSEE, VIRGINIA &
GEORGIA R. CO., Plf. in Err.,

v.

Annie May KANE.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. Where a nonresident witness for whom interrogatories had been sued out was in court at the time of the trial, it was error to permit the answers to the interrogatories to be read to the jury over objection of the opposite party, although the witness was in attendance upon the court at the instance of the latter, the witness being actually present when the answers to the interrogatories were offered in evidence.

2. It is not cause for a new trial that the court refused to allow certain questions propounded to witnesses by defendant's counsel to be answered, it not appearing what answers were expected, and in view of other evidence and of admissions in the declaration, no possible answers to these questions being substantially material.

3. Upon the trial of an action against a railroad company for homicide resulting in part from the misplacement of a switch, it was not error to refuse to allow the defendant to show "the common experience of railroads" in getting back switch keys from their employes, and that all railroads have great difficulty in keeping up with such keys and having them returned by discharged employes because of their real or alleged loss. Nor was there error in refusing to allow defendant to prove "the custom or usage of railroads in reference to providing a watchman for each of their switches," defendant expecting to prove "that the general custom was not to provide a watchman for such switches."

4. Though one of the main issues was whether or not the engineer for whose homicide the action was brought was guilty of negligence in bringing about the collision which resulted in his death, there was no error in refusing to allow the defendant to prove that he "was habitually reckless in running freight trains at excessive speed, and running too fast over switches," the witness' knowledge not extending to more than two or three instances.

5. The defendant may invoke and use allegations beneficial to himself made in plaintiff's declaration without offering the declaration itself in evidence, or otherwise proving the admissions contained in such allegations, and no unfavorable inference can properly be drawn against a corporation because of a failure to call as witnesses its own employes to prove the existence of facts shown by such admissions.

6. The mere fact that a railroad company fails to recover from a discharged employe a key which controls the turning of a switch is not of itself sufficient to make the company liable for the criminal act of such employe in maliciously misplacing a switch for the purpose of wrecking a train. The company is not bound to anticipate that, purely out of revenge for his discharge, a former employe might secretly commit so heinous a crime against it and the public. Nor is the company bound to exercise constant vigilance to prevent all persons whatsoever not in its employ from having the means or opportunity of tampering with its switches or its tracks. Whether or not in any particular case the company exercised the proper degree of care in protecting its switches from interference is a question for the jury, in determining which they may look to the evidence to ascertain if there was any reason for the company to apprehend such interference, and if so, whether, under all the circumstances, it used due diligence in endeavoring to prevent the same. In its charge to the jury, the court should not state or assume that a given state of facts would show negligence on the part of the company in the respect indicated.

7. A prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant, which the plaintiff's declaration covers, cannot be effectually answered by a given state of facts, if those facts involve a breach of diligence by the defendant in a material respect; and such breach of diligence, if shown, may be urged by the plaintiff, not to recover upon, but to defeat the defendant's justification, although no reference to it is made in the plaintiff's pleadings.

8. According to the undisputed facts, the plaintiff's husband was guilty of negligence in running his train in violation of the rules of the company, of which he had knowledge, and which he had agreed, upon entering its employment, to obey. For this reason, and because of errors committed by the court, there should be a new trial; and if, upon the next hearing, the evidence is substantially the same, there should be a verdict for the defendant.

ERROR to the City Court of Macon to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hill, Harris & Birch for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Lanier, Anderson & Anderson for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Section 3878 of the Code declares that if the state of facts on which a commission to take the interrogatories issued ceases to exist before the trial of the cause, and the witness is then accessible by subpoena, the testimony taken on interrogatories cannot be used. It follows, necessarily, that if the witness is accessible by being actually present in court at the trial when his testimony by interrogatories is offered, his answers to the same cannot be admitted, but the witness should be examined in person. It does not make the slightest difference that his attendance upon the court was at the instance and request of the opposite party. If, because of this fact, the party who had caused the interrogatories to be sued out does not desire to introduce the witness, it is his right to decline to do so; but if he wishes the testimony of the witness to go before the jury, he must put the witness on the stand. Testimony taken by interrogatories is, at best, unsatisfactory and imperfect, and it is the policy of the law to dispense with this method of securing evidence whenever practicable. Of course, if answers to interrogatories have already been read to the jury, and the witness afterwards comes into court, this would not require that the answers be ruled out or withdrawn. Nor must anything here said be construed to prevent the introduction of answers to interrogatories for the purpose of impeaching a witness when his testimony on the stand is in conflict with that which had been taken by commission. Nor is the rule announced applicable to female witnesses, for they enjoy at least a qualified privilege as to attending court.

2. The evidence showed that a violent collision had taken place between the engine which the plaintiff's husband was running as engineer, and certain box cars which were standing upon a side track. The wreck resulting from this collision was of such character that there could be no possible doubt the engine must have been running at a very rapid rate of speed. Counsel for the railway company elicited from certain witnesses a full description of the wreck and its consequences, and then asked of each "whether or not a collision of that violence could have taken place unless the engine had been running at a very high rate of speed." Upon objection by plaintiff's counsel the court refused to allow these questions to be answered; and, although it was not stated by counsel propounding the question what answers were expected, the court, perhaps, ought to have permitted the answers to go to the jury. It being manifest, however, that the engine was running very rapidly, and the plaintiff's declaration admitting this fact, the refusal of the court to allow the questions to be answered would certainly be no cause for a new trial.

3. The defendant desired to show "the common experience of railroads" in getting back switch keys from their employes, and, in this connection, to prove that all railroads have great difficulty in keeping up with such keys, and recovering them from discharged employes. It also sought to prove "the custom or usage of railroads in reference to providing a watchman for each of their switches," and "that the general custom was not to provide a watchman for such switches." The court rejected all of this testimony, and, in our opinion, did so properly. Testimony as to the common experience, customs, or usages of railroads, without reference to whether they are wisely or badly managed, or to their particular location or surroundings, or to peculiar circumstances which, in any given instance, would tend to illustrate the diligence or negligence of a company in recovering or failing to recover its switch keys, or in guarding or failing to guard its switches, would be too vague, uncertain, and indefinite to aid a jury in determining in a case on trial whether or not the railroad company was diligent or negligent in these respects. No two cases are exactly alike, and, the facts and circumstances in each being different in greater or less degree from those arising in others, the better and safer rule is to allow the jury, as to questions of the kind presented, to determine every case upon its own individual merits, and in the light of its own particular facts. In some cases the failure to recover a switch key or to have a switch guarded, might involve little or no negligence whatever. In other cases, such failure might amount to very gross negligence. This being so, to permit evidence as to the common experience and general custom of railroads in such matters would probably be misleading, and certainly would have little weight in a given case in arriving at a fair and just conclusion upon the question of negligence.

4. The main defense relied upon was that the engineer for whose homicide the action was brought was himself guilty of negligence in bringing about the collision which resulted in his death, by running his engine at too great a speed, and in violation of the company's rules. In support of this defense the defendant offered to prove by one McCrary that the deceased was habitually reckless in running freight trains at excessive speed, and in running too fast over switches. It appeared from McCrary's testimony that he had been conductor of a freight train on defendant's road between Macon and Brunswick, on which Kane was engineer, and that Kane had pulled him two or three times on a local freight. Under these circumstances, McCrary could hardly swear with accuracy to the habitual recklessness of the deceased. The admissibility of testimony of this kind is, at best, very doubtful. While in Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Flannagan, 82 Ga. 579, this court held that it was not error to receive evidence showing the high speed at which the same engine was habitually run by the same engineer at the same place, and that he habitually neglected to ring the bell, Chief Justice Bleckley, on pages 588, 589, 82 Ga., characterized this evidence as being of doubtful admissibility, and stated that the authorities upon the question were in conflict, citing quite a number on both sides. The testimony offered in the case at bar is by no means so strong or pertinent as that in Flannagan's Case; so, upon the whole, we conclude there was no error in rejecting it. In this connection, see also, Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Newman, 85 Ga. 517, and Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kent, 87 Ga. 402, 408.

5. It would be a long step forward in judicial procedure if each party was required to admit every allegation in the pleadings of the other party which he was unwilling to deny upon oath, and thus relieve his adversary of the necessity of proving matters concerning which there is no real contest, and saving the courts much time, vexation, and trouble. If this be so, certainly a party should be relieved from proving that which his adversary distinctly alleges. No sensible reason occurs to us why the defendant may not avail himself of all allegations in the plaintiff's declaration, without formally tendering the declaration in evidence, or otherwise proving the admissions it contains. The declaration being the very foundation of the plaintiff's case, he certainly should be bound by whatever he chooses to allege therein; and he can have no just reason to complain if, in the progress of the trial, his own assertions be taken as true. Nor can we see any reason for requiring the defendant to offer the declaration in evidence. It is usually read to the jury, or its contents are stated in their hearing, and they have it before them in their deliberations. It is therefore available for all proper purposes, whether it be distinctly offered as evidence against the plaintiff or not. As far back as 9 Ga., in Peacock v. Terry, (page 187,) the principle for which we are contending was distinctly stated in the following language: "Facts alleged positively in a bill are constructive admissions in favor of the defendant, and need not be proven. The complainant cannot deny them, even if they are not true, but must recover according to the case he makes upon the record." And Judge Nisbet makes the matter as clear as daylight on pages 149, 150, of the same volume. In the present case the plaintiff's declaration alleged that her husband was running his engine at a high rate of speed, and the defendant consequently had a right to rely upon this allegation as an admitted fact, and no unfavorable inference could, therefore, be drawn against the company because of any failure on its part to call as witnesses its own employes to prove this fact.

6. While a railroad company is bound to exercise ordinary diligence to recover its switch keys from discharged employes, the mere failure to do so in a particular instance would not, per se, make the company liable for the consequences of a criminal misplacement of a switch by a discharged employe who had retained in his possession a key which enabled him to do the mischief. What would be ordinary diligence in endeavoring to recover a switch key from one no longer in the company's employ must necessarily vary according to the facts and circumstances surrounding each particular case. Very slight diligence would be "ordinary" in the absence of any reason to anticipate or fear that the key would be improperly used by the person who was allowed to retain it. If there was any reason to excite such fear, the company would be under greater obligations either to get back the key, or else guard all switches, an interference with which was to be anticipated; and the greater the reason for apprehending such interference, the greater should be the care and diligence of the company to prevent it. No fixed and unbending rule could be laid down which would be fixed and applicable to every case. It is simply one of those things which a jury must determine in each case in the light of its own particular and peculiar facts and circumstances. This much, however, may be regarded as well as settled, viz., that, in the absence of any reason other than the mere fact of his discharge from his service, a railway company is not bound to anticipate that a former employé, purely out of revenge for his discharge, will secretly commit so heinous a crime against it and the public as to maliciously misplace a switch for the purpose of wrecking a train. In Keeley v. Erie R. Co., 47 How. Pr. 256, the evidence showed conclusively that there was no negligence or want of proper care on the part of the defendant in the management of its road or in the running of its cars at the time of the accident, but was clear and convincing that the accident was caused solely by the misplacement of a switch by some evil-disposed person, not connected with the road, shortly preceding the arrival of the train in the night-time; and it was accordingly held that a nonsuit was proper. This case is cited approvingly in Bishop, Non-Contract Law, § 550. We do not think a railroad company is bound, under all circumstances, and at all times, to maintain constant vigilance to prevent all persons whatever not in its employ from having the means or opportunity of tampering with its switches or its tracks. In Keeley's Case, supra, the court does not discuss the duty of the company to keep a constant and unremitting watch against trespassers, but seems to take it for granted that usually this would be impossible, and this we think is undoubtedly true. As stated above, the only practicable way of ascertaining whether or not, in any particular instance, the company exercised the proper degree of care in protecting its switches from interference, is to leave the question to a jury; and in determining it they may look to all the surrounding circumstances to ascertain if there was any reason for the company to apprehend such interference, and if, so, whether, in the given instance, it used due diligence in endeavoring to prevent the same. In the case with which we are now dealing, the charge of the court, in effect, made the failure of the company to recover a switch key which had been suffered to remain in the hands of a discharged employé, if ordinary diligence had not been used by the company to get the key back, a ground of recovery. This charge assumed that the mere failure to recover the key was the cause of the injury, and was therefore erroneous. Even granting that such failure amounted to a breach of ordinary diligence, it might not, of itself, have been sufficient to authorize a recovery. It was still a question for the jury, and not for the court, whether the negligence of the company, if negligent at all, in failing to recover the key, was, under the circumstances, the real cause of the injury.

7. One ground of the motion for a new trial assigned as error the refusal of the court to charge the following written request: "The plaintiff is confined to the allegations of negligence made in the petition. There is no allegation of negligence respecting the company's leaving any key in the possession of any employé, and you cannot find for the plaintiff on that ground." It is true that the plaintiff did not seek to recover because of negligence on the part of defendant in improperly leaving one of its switch keys in the custody of a discharged employé; but because of the alleged negligent misplacement of a switch which caused the death of her husband. The plaintiff proved that the switch was misplaced, and that such misplacement was the cause of the collision. The defendant sought in reply to show that the misplacement of the switch was not due to its fault, but that the mischief was done by an evil-disposed person, not in its service. The plaintiff, in turn, endeavored to meet this defense by proving that the company was negligent in affording the evil-disposed person an opportunity to carry out his designs, and in not taking the proper steps to prevent their successful accomplishment: in other words, the plaintiff sought to break down the defense of the company by showing that the facts alleged and proved by it involved a breach of diligence on its part in a material respect. It is quite clear to our minds that the plaintiff had a right to urge such breach of diligence, not as a distinct basis of recovery, but for the purpose of defeating the defendant's justification, and this the plaintiff could do although she had not in her pleadings made any special reference to this particular negligence on the part of the defendant. If the charge requested had been given, this right of the plaintiff would have been cut off, and the request was therefore properly refused.

8. The motion for a new trial contained many grounds. We have ruled upon and disposed of such of the same as bear materially upon the real merits of the case. The questions presented by those not mentioned will most probably not arise upon the next trial. According to the plaintiff's own allegations in her declaration, her husband was running his train at a high rate of speed at the time of the collision, and the undisputed evidence is, he was running it in direct violation of positive rules of the company, of which he not only had knowledge, but which he had expressly and solemnly, upon entering the service of the company, agreed to obey. The following are such extracts from the rules introduced in evidence as are pertinent: "All trains will approach stations with great care, expecting to find the main track occupied between the station limits (switches, when no posts are up, or other point designated). The responsibility for accident between limit posts (or switches), or at fuel and water stations, will rest with approaching trains." "All trains must reduce speed, and run with great care, after rains and storms, while passing switches, through tunnels, and crossing long bridges." "When approaching stations and sidings, enginemen must observe that switches are set right, and always look out for signals." "Conductors and enginemen will be held equally responsible for the violation of any of the rules governing the safety of their trains, and must take every precaution for the protection of their trains, even if not provided for by the rules." The plaintiff's husband being an employé of the company, and having been guilty of negligence in bringing about the catastrophe which resulted in his death, she was not entitled, under the facts as they appear of record, to a recovery. For this reason, and because of errors committed by the court, a new trial is ordered; and if upon the next hearing the evidence is substantially the same there should be a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment reversed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

MICHIGAN SHINGLE CO.

v.

STATE INVESTMENT INSURANCE CO.,
Plff. in Err.

(94 Mich. 389.)

The knowledge of an insurance agent that a warranty by the assured that "a continuous clear space of 150 feet shall hereafter be maintained" between the property insured and any woodworking or manufacturing establishment did not represent the existing state of facts and that there was no intent to change the situation and that the insured could not control a clear space for that distance, prevents a forfeiture of the policy for breach of the warranty, where the agent accepts the premium and issues the policy without taking any steps subsequently to rescind it though knowing of the breach of the warranty, and it appears that on account of the situation of the property, the manner of its use, and its proximity to water, he considered that the existing space was equivalent to that required.

(Grant and Montgomery, JJ., dissent.)

(December 24, 1892.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Muskegon County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bunker & Carpenter and R. W. Barger, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff alleged it had maintained the required clear space, and under this allegation it was permitted to prove, not that it did maintain it, but that though it had not maintained it, it had been excused therefrom by other affirmative testimony in avoidance. Before this testimony could properly be admitted the plaintiff should, by his pleadings, have confessed that it did not exist, and alleged other facts which would constitute an avoidance.

Meadows v. Hawthorne Ins. Co. 62 Iowa, 387. Suppose that Mr. Smith knew when the policy was negotiated that the space did not then exist. The warranty was that thereafter this space should be maintained. Did the fact that Smith knew the situation when the policy was asked for or issued tend to prove that after the policy was issued this space was maintained? Not at all. And this space thereafter must be maintained or the policy would be void.

Adair v. Adair, 5 Mich. 204, 71 Am. Dec. 779.

The policy provided that "no officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy, except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, and as to such provisions and conditions, no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power, or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured, unless so written or attached.

If this clause was a part of our policy, and itself was not also waived, then Mr. Smith had no right to strike out the space clause of the policy without at least indorsing it in writing upon the policy, and this was not done, and therefore proof of an elimination of this space clause from the contract by Mr. Smith orally or otherwise not indorsed on the policy was incompetent.

Cleaver v. Traders' Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 527; Robinson v. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia, 68 Mich. 90; Hankins v. Rockford Ins. Co. 70 Wis. 1; Wulsh v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 78 N. Y. 5; Marvin v. Universal L. Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 278, 39 Am. Rep. 657; German Ins. Co. v. Heiduk, 80 Neb. 296; Waynesboro Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Conover, 98 Pa. 384, 42 Am. Rep. 618.

The understanding of Mr. Ducey was not competent evidence as to what this written contract was. Neither was the second-hand opinion of insurance men, as it was given by Mr. Ducey against our objection.

NOTE.—The effect of an agent's knowledge of the falsity of answers in an application for insurance is treated in an extensive note to Clemans v. Supreme Assembly Royal Soc. of Good Fellows (N. Y.) 16 L. R. A. 83.

The rule that has been in some cases strictly applied is plied to deny any relief from the falsity of a warranty even if the facts were known to the insurance agent is limited in an important respect by the decision in the above case and that following, Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Robison, post, 825.

Holmes v. Hall, 8 Mich. 66, 77 Am. Dec. 444; Chippewa Lumber Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 80 Mich. 116; Tompkins v. Gardner & S. Co. 69 Mich. 62; Jones v. Phelps, 5 Mich. 218; Sutherland v. Crane, Walk. Ch. 523; Walker v. State Ins. Co. 46 Kan. 812; Putnam v. Russell, 86 Mich. 389; McKenzie v. Sykes, 47 Mich. 295.

The policy provided that "this policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions," none of which they declare in writing can or shall be considered as waived, except evidence of the agreement to waive same be indorsed in writing upon the contract itself. Under these circumstances the circuit court should have sustained the motion of defendant for verdict.

Co.* 2 N. Y. 210; Aurora F. Ins. Co. v. Eddy, 49 Ill. 106; Ripley v. Etna Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 187, 86 Am. Dec. 362; First Nat. Bank of Ballston Spa v. North America Ins. Co. 50 N. Y. 45; Blumer v. Phenix Ins. Co. 45 Wis. 622; Bibbrough v. Metropolis Ins. Co. 5 Duer, 587.

The meaning of the language of the contract was a question of law for the court and not of fact for the jury.

Messrs. Smith, Nims, Hoyt & Erwin for defendant in error.

Durand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was brought to recover upon an insurance policy, by which the defendant had insured the plaintiff upon certain lumber, lath and shingles, owned by it, or held in trust or on commission, or sold but not delivered, piled on its mill docks Nos. 3, 4, and 5, at Muskegon, Mich. Among other things the policy contained a clause as follows: "Warranted by the assured that a continuous clear place of 150 feet shall hereafter be maintained between the property hereby insured and any woodworking or manufacturing establishment, and that said space shall not be used for handling or piling of lumber thereon for temporary purposes, tramways upon which lumber is not piled alone being excepted; but this shall not be construed to prohibit loading or unloading within, or the transportation of lumber and timber products across, such clear space; it being especially understood and agreed by the assured that any violation of this warranty shall render this policy null and void." Within a few days after the policy was given, the insured property was destroyed by fire. At the time the policy was issued the agent who insured it knew the exact condition and location of the insured property, and knew that the clear space of 150 feet, actual measurement, did not exist, and he also knew that the assured did not have it in its power to control a clear space for 150 feet, as mentioned in the policy. He knew that the adjoining docks 1 and 2 were being used for the purpose of piling lumber and shingles upon, and that it was not the intention of the assured to make any change in its method of conducting the business, or in the use of the space as it was used at the time the policy was given. He also knew, as stated in the brief of defendant's counsel, that in a narrow straight line from the lumber on the docks to the plaintiff's saw-mill there was perhaps a clear space of 150 feet, but that out of a straight line this was not so, and that between the lumber on the docks and Hovey & McCracken's mill there was not a continuous clear space of even 100 feet. But the agent understood it, and knew how the docks were used and to be used. The rate of premium to be paid for insurance upon the different docks was fixed by defendant's agent with reference to the supposed risk in view of the manner in which the docks were used, and the distance from other exposure. The record shows that although the clear space referred to was not 150 feet, actual measurement yet that on account of the situation of the property, the manner of its use, and its proximity to water, it was considered equivalent to that distance by insurance men, and the testimony clearly shows that it was so considered in the office of the defendant's agent, who, in full knowledge of the actual distance maintained and to be maintained, wrote the policy referred to, and placed that distance at 150 feet. No change was made by the assured after the issuing of the policy, and of this fact, also, the defendant's agent had full knowledge. He resided in Muskegon, had examined this property with special reference to its location and to its desirability as insurance property, and, knowing these facts, issued the policy referred to, and took the premium which he charged for the insurance. The defendant insists that the clause "that there shall be hereafter maintained 150 feet clear space" must be rendered literally, and without regard to the knowledge of the agent as to what the actual distance was, thereby asserting that it has the right to accept the money of the assured, issuing its policy therefor, and lead him to understand that he has a valid insurance until a loss occurs, and then to repudiate its liability. Such a rule as this would enable it to affirm a contract entered into by it with full knowledge of all the facts in so far as such contract might be of advantage to it, and to repudiate it the moment it ceased to be advantageous. This is inequitable, and contrary to the well-established rule in reference to when and how the repudiation of a contract shall be made. The knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the company.

"If the insurer receives the premiums with full knowledge of facts constituting a breach of one of the conditions of the policy, the right to insist that the policy is forfeited for that cause is gone." Mershon v. National Ins. Co. 34 Iowa, 87. In Piumb v. Cattaraugus County Mut. Ins. Co., 18 N. Y. 892, 73 Am. Dec. 526, where the agent of a company had incorrectly filled in the measurements, he himself knowing that they were incorrect, it was held that his knowledge bound the company,—that they were estopped to deny the assertion. In Rowley v. Empire Ins. Co., 3 Keyes, 557, the application stated: "I own the property; there is no incumbrance." But there was a mortgage upon the property, of which the insurer's agent had notice, but notwithstanding that notice the agent filled up the policy, setting forth falsely that there was no incumbrance. It was held that the insurers were estopped to set up the incumbrance as a defense to the action. In Hodgkins v. Montgomery County Mut. Ins. Co., 34 Barb. 213, the application stated: "The above property is owned and occupied by me."

As a matter of fact these words were inserted by the defendant's agent after plaintiff had informed him as to the particular nature of his title and interest, which was a contract for the purchase of the land, and for which a deed was not demandable at the time the fire occurred. It was held that the knowledge of the agent was the knowledge of his concern, and that the insurers were estopped to defend on the ground that the interest was misstated. In Howard F. Ins. Co. v. Bruner, 23 Pa. 50, the description and survey were made a part of the policy and a warranty on the part of the insured, and one of the conditions was that a false description should vitiate the policy. The application failed to disclose mortgages to the amount of $6,000 which were upon the property. It stated that the works were operated by the proprietor, and lighted by closed lamps. The proof showed that an open light was used to light up with; that the works were not exclusively operated by the proprietor; but it was proved that the company's agent knew how the building was occupied, and knew of the mortgage; and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. In Cumberland Valley Mut. Prot. Co. v. Schell, 29 Pa. 81, insurer's agent examined the premises, and wrote the description in the application, but nothing was said about an oven contained in the building. Held, that it would not avoid the policy if the material matter was open to view, or if the insurer's agent had notice of it. The same rule was held in Columbia Ins. Co. v. Cooper, 50 Pa. 331. In People's Ins. Co. v. Spencer, 53 Pa. 353, 91 Am. Dec. 217, the policy stated that "the risk shall not be increased without the consent of insurers." The insured did increase the risk by using it for the purpose of distilling whiskey. It was held a question of fact for the jury whether the agent ought to have known from the examination he made, or was told, that the premises would be used for distilling, and, if he did know it, the company must be held to have taken the risk with their eyes open. In James River Ins. Co. v. Merrill, 47 Ala. 387, the application described the property as a frame steam sawmill and machinery contained therein. As a matter of fact there was a planing machine in the building, which was a class of property for which a higher rate of premium would have been charged. The insurer pleaded that the presence of the planing machine was concealed. The plaintiff replied that the application was written by the defendant's agent after an inspection of the property. It was held that the replication was good. In Franklin v. Atlantic F. Ins. Co., 42 Mo. 456, it was stipulated that the interest of the insured in the property must be an entire, unconditional, and sole ownership. The company's agent was informed that the insured was only a part owner, and that the property was incumbered. It was held that the company was estopped to set up the conditional interest as a defense to the action. In Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Wright, 23 Ill. 463, it was stipulated that, if the interest of the insured was other than absolute, the insurance should be void. The fact was that the absolute title was held by trustees for the use of his wife, which fact was not stated in the policy, but the particulars of the title were made known to the company's agent. It was held that the company was estopped to contradict the description stated in the policy. In Home Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Garfield, 60 Ill. 124, 14 Am. Rep. 27, it was stipulated that if the interest of the insured be less than a fee it must be stated in the policy. The insured stated that it was a fee. The agent of the company knew that he had made a mortgage upon the premises to secure $10,000, and the policy was made payable to the mortgagee. It was held that to permit the company to defend on that ground would countenance the perpetration of a gross fraud. The same rule is held in Rockford Ins. Co. v. Nelson, 65 Ill. 415; Anders Ins. Co. v. Shipman, 77 Ill. 189. In McBride v. Republic F. Ins. Co., 30 Wis. 563, the application was filled up by the company's agent, stating the title to be in the plaintiff. It was held that if the agent was informed in regard to the title, and he inserted in the application an untruth in respect to it, the misrepresentation would not affect the plaintiff's right to recover; and in Winnans v. Allemansia F. Ins. Co. 38 Wis. 843, where the insurer was prohibited, among other things, from using gasoline within the insured building, except by writing indorsed on the policy, it was proved that the agent consented that the premises might be lighted with gasoline until a change in the manner of lighting could be effected. The premises were consumed by fire before the change was made. It was held to be settled law in that state that an agent of an insurance company, authorized to take risks and issue policies against fire, may waive by parol any conditions in the policies issued by him. The agent who has power to accept applications and issue policies, but who with knowledge of the facts fails to state them correctly, binds the company to the misdescriptions made by him; and although the statements made in the application were untrue, yet if the insurer was informed of and knew the truth, and after such knowledge received the application and premium and issued the policy, he must be held liable, and the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the insurer. Miller v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 216, 7 Am. Rep. 122; Ayres v. Home Ins. Co. 21 Iowa, 185. In Peoria M. & F. Ins. Co. v. Hall, 12 Mich. 202, the policy prohibited keeping gunpowder without permission written upon the policy. It was held if the agent who issued the policy knew that gunpowder was kept, and to be kept, the contract was valid, whether permission was indorsed or not, notwithstanding the printed condition in the contract showing the agent's authority was limited, for the company must be regarded as having known that gunpowder was and would be kept; the knowledge of the agent being the knowledge of the principal. It would be a fraud to permit him to issue a policy which they intended to treat as void if loss occurred. In Atina Live Stock, F. & T. Ins. Co. v. Olmstead, 21 Mich. 246, 4 Am. Rep. 483, the application was required to state what, if any, incumbrances were upon the property insured, and the amount. There were two mortgages upon it. The company's agent admitted that he knew of the mortgages when he drew up the application. The application was made part of the contract, and the answers were expressly made warranties. It was held that the failure to disclose the mortgages was to be attributed either to the agent's ignorance, negligence, or fraudulent pretense; he was giving an indemnity when he knew he was giving none; and that it was fraud on the insured to take the premium; hence the insurers were estopped on that ground. The same rule was laid down in Michigan State Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 80 Mich. 41; Hall v. Concordia F. Ins. Co. 90 Mich. 403; Haire v. Ohio Farmers' Ins. Co. 93 Mich. 481.

In commenting on this subject, in Atina Live Stock, F. & T. Ins. Co. v. Olmstead, supra, Mr. Justice Cooley says: "It is true that in this case the paper in question was drawn by an agent, but we do not think that in a legal point of view the rights of the parties are any different from what they would be had the agent himself been the insurer. The insurance business of the world is done through agents almost exclusively, and the maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, applies with special force to their acts. These agents assume to have, and generally do have, much more intimate knowledge of the business than those with whom they deal, . . . and when an agent, who at the time and place is the sole representative of the principal, assumes to know what information the principal requires, and, after being furnished with all the facts, drafts the paper, which he declares satisfactory, induces the other party to sign it, receives and retains the insurance money, and then delivers a contract which the other party is led to believe, and has a right to believe, gives him the indemnity for which he paid his money, we do not think the insurer can be heard in repudiation of the indemnity, on the ground of his agent's unskillfulness, carelessness, or fraud. If this can be done, it is easy to see that the community is at the mercy of the insurance agents, who will have little difficulty, in a large proportion of the cases, in giving a worthless policy for the money they receive."

Act 149 of the Session Laws of 1881, which is an act to provide for a standard form of fire insurance policy, was evidently intended by the legislature to prevent some of the abuses complained of by Mr. Justice Cooley, for it is expressly stated in the act that the form of policy contemplated by it was for the purpose, among other things, of "securing fairness and equity between the insurers and insured," and for the "avoidance of conditions, the violation of which by the assured would, without being prejudicial to the insurer, render the policy void, or voidable at the option of the insurer." If the end sought for by the legislature has not been accomplished it is no fault of the act. It is certain, however, that it was not thought desirable that the insurer should be furnished with any more avenues for the avoidance of its policies than had already been recognized by the courts, when dealing with the forfeiture clauses usually contained in policies of insurance. No different rule should be adopted in this class of cases than is in others, and the same rules in relation to estoppel and waiver should be applied. In this case the agent of the company knew the exact amount of continuous clear space kept, and to be kept, by the plaintiff, and decided that such clear space, in consideration of the situation of the property and its surroundings, was equivalent to 150 feet, as ordinarily understood by insurance men. He wrote the distance in the policy himself. He took the plaintiff's money for a supposable valid insurance, and led him to believe it was such. He knew that no change was made by the plaintiff to increase the actual amount of continuous clear space after the policy was issued, and that it was not expected by either party that he should do so. Yet, knowing these facts, no steps were taken by him to cancel the policy, or to refund the money obtained from plaintiff on account of it. The benefits of the transaction were all retained by the defendant so long as no liability was impending, and it was not until after the loss occurred that a forfeiture was claimed by it. To allow this to be done under these circumstances would be to permit a person to keep silent when he should speak, and to enable him to reap the benefit of his own wrongdoing after having himself led his victim into a trap. It must be held that the defendant is estopped from avoiding the policy for the reasons claimed by it.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Grant, J., dissenting:

This is a suit upon a policy of insurance dated September 2, 1890, and covering the same property as that in the case of the same plaintiff v. London & Lancashire Fire Ins. Co., 91 Mich. 441. The policy is one known as the "Michigan Standard," being the one required by the Michigan statute. Its terms are identical in language with that of the London & Lancashire Fire Insurance Company. The warranty for the maintenance of 150 feet clear space is the same. The only dif-policy." One Easton, a local insurance agent, testified that he knew the use to which these docks were put, and that the rate of $2.75 per hundred on docks 3, 4, and 5 was because there was 150 feet space from the mill. On cross-examination the witness was asked, "When you say that that rate was fixed because it was more than 150 feet from any woodworking or manufacturing establishment, you mean that it was because there were more than 150 feet of clear continuous space between the property rated and such an institution, do you not?" Answer. I mean to say that there was 150 feet space between the shingle company's mill and this lumber. Question. In fixing the rate at $2.75 on lumber, it is established only in such cases where it is at least 150 feet of continuous clear space between the property rated and such an establishment, is it not? A. I don't think there was 150 feet space. Q. You don't answer my question. A. That is the basis the rate is fixed."

One Wood, another local insurance agent, testified that he thought the space between dock 1 and the westerly dock of the adjoining mill owners, which was less than 100 feet, was considered equivalent to 150 feet. He further testified that sometimes docks 1 and 2 were covered with shingles, and sometimes they were not, and that they varied at different times in amount and in places where they were piled, according as they were manufactured and shipped. In reply to the question whether in placing insurance under the circumstances it would be expected by insurance men that the material on docks 1 and 2 should be removed, or whether he would simply expect to maintain substantially the same conditions as existed at the time the insurance was effected, this witness said: "That would be considered as maintaining it at the time insurance was effected by some insurance men. I don't know that all would consider it so." All this testimony was received under objection and exception. At the time of the fire, shingles were piled upon docks 1 and 2 to within 25 or 30 feet of the mill, and lumber was also piled upon the docks of the adjoining mill owner to the west. The above is the substantial statement of all of the material testimony.

The court submitted the case to the jury, and the theory upon which this was done appears in the following portion of his charge: "The main controversy in question for you to decide is whether or not the plaintiff did maintain, during all the time this policy of insurance was in force,—that is, from the time it was issued up to and including the time of the fire,—this continuous clear space of 150 feet between the property insured on these three docks and any woodworking or manufacturing establishment, according to the true intent and meaning of that language as employed in that policy, and as the parties understood it. The plaintiffs claim that they did. The defendant claims that they did not. To entitle the plaintiff to recover, it must have satisfied you by a fair preponderance of the testimony in the case that it did maintain that clear space. Now, the contention is right there. The plaintiff says, 'We did maintain it; we made the contract; we don't deny it; it is there just as it reads; but we insist that we did maintain that space just as we understood it, and just as you understood it,—just as you knew we understood it.'" The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. The facts were undisputed, and the question was one of law to be determined by the court. The jury must have found that the plaintiff and defendant's local agent understood and agreed that 25 or 30 feet between docks 1 and 2 and the mill was the equivalent of the 150 feet provided by the contract, and that the space of 96 feet between dock 1 and the next dock to the west was also the equivalent of 150 feet. The warranty was not one as to existing facts, but of conditions to be maintained in the future. There is nothing upon this record to show, nor is it claimed, that the plaintiff did not fully understand the terms of its contract. It knew that it had agreed to maintain 150 feet clear space. The condition was not impossible of performance. The result of this holding would be to set aside the plain and unmistakable terms of a contract, and substitute therefor by implication another and entirely different contract. The warranty was not affirmative, but promissory, in its character. If this be the rule, then if plaintiff had been in the habit of keeping a pile of lumber midway, and in a direct line, between these docks and its mill, and the defendant's local agent had known this when the policy was issued, the subsequent maintenance of such a pile of lumber would not have vitiated the policy, and the space would be held to be the equivalent of 150 feet clear space. Again, if there had been another mill or woodworking establishment situated 20 feet, or any number of feet less than 150, to the northward of docks 3, 4, and 5, this must in law be held to have been the like equivalent. Many other illustrations will readily suggest themselves to show the consequences of such a rule. Mr. May, in his work on Insurance, (sec. 156,) says: "One of the very objects of the warranty is to preclude all controversy as to the materiality or immateriality of the statement. The only question is, has the warranty been kept? There is no room for construction no latitude, no equity. If the warranty be a statement of fact, it must be literally true; if a stipulation that a certain act shall or shall not be done, it must be literally performed."

Plaintiff averred that it had kept 150 feet clear space. It did not allege that in one direction it kept only 25 or 30 feet, or that in another it kept only 96 feet, and that this was understood and agreed to be the equivalent of 150 feet. No such issue was framed for trial. If this clause had been inserted in the contract by fraud or mistake, plaintiff's remedy would have been in equity to reform the contract. The testimony admitted to change the express terms of the contract was incompetent. It did not tend to show any fraud or mistake, nor refer to any statements of the agents of either party affecting the question. When a principal has received a contract, made in his name by his agent, which on its face has but one meaning, such contract cannot be changed or avoided by showing a custom of business prior to the contract, and leaving a jury or court to infer that something else was meant. This case is in my judgment clearly ruled by Michigan Shingle Co. v. London & Lancashire Fire Ins. Co., supra.

It is the duty of courts to interpret contracts, not to make them. When the language is susceptible of but one meaning, courts have no right to say that the parties meant something else. This is not a case where the insured disclosed his title to the agent of the insurer, and the agent neglected to disclose it to his principal, as was the case in Rowley v. Empire Ins. Co. 8 Keyes, 557; Hodgkins v. Montgomery County Mut. Ins. Co. 84 Barb. 218; Franklin v. Atlantic F. Ins. Co. 42 Mo. 456; Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Wright, 22 Ill. 462; Home Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Garfield, 60 Ill. 124, 14 Am. Rep. 127; Atina Live Stock, F. & T. Ins. Co. v. Olmstead, 21 Mich. 246, 4 Am. Rep. 488; McBride v. Republic F. Ins. Co. 30 Wis. 562; nor the failure of the agent of the insurer, who wrote the application and took the risk, to insert in it that a planing mill was used in the mill, as was the case in James River Ins. Co. v. Merritt, 47 Ala. 387; nor of the parol waiver of a condition in the policy by the agent till a change could be made to correspond with its terms, as in Winans v. Allemantia F. Ins. Co., 38

Wis. 342; nor where the insured was induced by the agent to believe that he could keep gunpowder, which was prohibited by the policy, as in Peoria M. & F. Ins. Co. v. Hall, 12 Mich. 213. These cases, and many like them, are based upon the fact that there is a difference between the representations in the policy and the actual facts existing at the time, or that there was an express waiver by the agent of a condition in the policy. In the present case there was no misrepresentation, no misunderstanding, no statement made to induce the assured to believe that his contract meant other than it read, or that it would be relieved from the full performance of its provisions. Plaintiff's warranty was not that a certain state of facts existed, but that a certain state of facts should exist in futuro. If it did not desire such a contract it should have declined to make it. It cannot now be heard to say to the defendant: "You knew that I did not intend to keep my warranty, and therefore are estopped to say that I did not keep my contract."

Judgment should be reversed, and no new trial ordered.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

MUTUAL BENEFIT LIFE INSURANCE CO., Appt.,

v.

Charles W. ROBISON.

(55 Fed. Rep. 723.)

- 1. The difference between a warranty and a representation in an application for insurance is that a warranty must be literally true without regard to its materiality to the risk, while a representation must be true only so far as it is material to the risk.
- 2. An insurance company is estopped to question the truth of answers in an application, notwithstanding the application warrants the answers to be true, where they are made under a requirement of the company by its own medical examiner who deduces the answer from facts correctly stated to him by the applicant.
- 3. The construction of the words "spitting of blood" by a medical examiner in filling out answers to an application for insurance, as it was his duty to do, to mean the spitting of blood from the lungs or bronchial tubes only, is conclusive on the insurance company.
- 4. A clause in a policy withholding from agents authority "to make, alter, or discharge this or any other contract in relation to the matter of this insurance" has no reference to the application which precedes the policy.
- 5. The rule that the breach of a warranty of the truth of an applicant's answer avoids an insurance policy without reference to his good faith or the ma- teriality of the answer cannot be applied to avoid a policy for the falsity of an answer resulting from a mistake in judgment, or an error, or blunder of the company's agent who was specially charged by the company with the preparation of the application and who made the answers upon a full and truthful statement of the facts by the applicant.

- 6. A rule of evidence under a state statute as to privileged communications must be regarded in a circuit court sitting in that state, under U. S. Rev. Stat., § 863, making the laws of the state the rules of decision as to competency of witnesses, except as affected by the color or interest of the witness, or in actions against executors and administrators or guardians.
- 7. Judicial notice will be taken by a federal court that the distance between Dubuque, Iowa, and Asheville, N. C., is more than 100 miles.
- 8. A witness "lives" where he is sojourning for his health for an uncertain time within the meaning of U. S. Rev. Stat., § 863, in respect to the taking of depositions of a witness who lives more than 100 miles from the place of trial.

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Iowa dismissing a bill filed to cancel certain life insurance policies. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Argued before Caldwell and Sanborn, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Francis B. Daniels, for appellants: The statute of Iowa in respect to testimony of physicians, etc., does not apply in this court.

Stephen, Dig. Ev. Reynold's ed. 1879, art. 117; Greenl. Ev. § 248.

There is a difference between the common law of Iowa and that of New Jersey, in the construction of written contracts of insurance as to the distinction between warranties and representations. The supreme court of Iowa is also at variance with the Supreme Court of the United States regarding these particulars. If these differences should seem material in the case at bar, either the construction of the courts of New Jersey, or that of the Supreme Court of the United States, should prevail.

Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044.

This policy was subjected to the New Jersey construction by the express stipulation of the parties themselves.

Andrews v. Pond, 88 U. S. 13 Pet. 77, 78, 10 L. ed. 66, 67; Story, Conf. L. 6th ed. § 380; Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124, 27 L. ed. 104, approved in Watts v. Camors, 115 U. S. 363, 362, 29 L. ed. 406, 409; Coghlan v. South Carolina R. Co. 142 U. S. 101, 109, 85 L. ed. 951, 954.

In the authorities cited below there is nothing against the application of the New Jersey construction to the policy, in particulars not embraced by the statutes of Iowa.

Wall v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. 32 Fed. Rep. 278; Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Pettus, 140 U. S. 226, 35 L. ed. 497; Berry v. Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Co. 46 Fed. Dr. Staples knew, and Mr. Robison knew, that Mr. Robison's spitting of blood was not the kind of spitting of blood that every one has. They knew that his spitting was of a character exceptional to that experienced by all men. When they knew that, they knew that it was, at the least, a case of which the particulars should be given under head of "Remarks," so that the company could determine their importance at the home office.

I have no doubt that, if a man had spit blood from his lungs, no matter in how small a quantity, or even had spit blood from an ulcerated sore-throat, he would be bound to state it. The fact should be made known to the office, in order that their medical adviser might make inquiry into the cause.

Geach v. Ingall, 14 Mees. & W. 95.

The policy provides: "Nor are agents authorized to make, alter, or discharge this or any other contract in relation to the matter of this insurance, or to waive any forfeiture thereof." This provision denies any right of the examiner to construe the terms of the application which is a part of the contract.

Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. of N. Y. v. Wolff, 95 U. S. 326, 24 L. ed. 387.

But even if this were not so, the authority 23 L. R. A.

relied on by Mr. Robison must be proved by him, which has not been done.

See First Unitarian Soc. of Chicago v. Faulkner, 91 U. S. 417, 23 L. ed. 284.

In order to bind the company by the construction given by the local examiner, it is necessary that express authority in the examiner be shown.

Connecticut Gen. L. Ins. Co. v. McMurdy, 89 Pa. 363.

This answer is false, even if Dr. G. M. Staples' construction of the words "spitting of blood" should be regarded as binding upon the company. There is a clear preponderance of the evidence that this spitting of blood was from the lungs, or hæmoptysis. If so, the applicant's misstatement was fatal, no matter how he was led into the error.

Anything, small or great, which was of sufficient importance to consult a physician for, and happened within seven years, is asked for. It is clear that the intention is to embrace the small things which might perhaps have been outgrown in seven years, but if within the seven years they should be reported to the home office for it to determine whether they might affect the risk.

The court below seems to argue good faith from the fact that the matters so carefully concealed from the home office were talked over with the local agents. It seems to us that this fact makes the other way, that the very thing one should do to present the most honest face while working dishonestly through a conniving agent is to assume the appearance of the utmost frankness before the agent.

New York L. Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 29 L. ed. 934; Globe Reserve Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Duffy, 76 Md. 293.

A warranty is a part of the contract. A representation is preliminary or collateral to the contract. The warranty—a part of the contract itself—cannot be modified or affected by prior or contemporaneous oral agreements or statements. Whether the matter covered by the warranty be material or immaterial, whether the truth respecting it be known or unknown, makes no difference. With regard to a representation, on the other hand—being only collateral—it cannot affect the rights of the parties unless it be material, and its legal effect will be the same whether it be verbal or written, or partly verbal and partly written.

May, Ins. 8d ed. § 156, note 3.

If upon the facts, the person to whom the representations are made is held to be such an agent that he can be treated as standing in the place of the company to receive the representations, it follows, as a matter of course, that the company will be held to know everything that is represented, whether by word of mouth, or by paper and pen, and consequently that the company cannot escape liability on the plea that it acted in ignorance of such of the representations as were made by word of mouth.

If the cases holding that an insurance company cannot avoid liability by a fact the existence of which was communicated orally to the agent, are carefully examined, they will be found (questions of positive fraud aside) to come under one or the other of the following categories:

1. The statements are mere representations, not warranties.
2. The distinction between warranties and representations is lost sight of.
3. The application is the work of the agent, and is signed by the applicant without reading or knowing its contents.
4. The doctrine of estoppel is announced as the reason for holding the company.

Cases of mere representations are not relevant. The case at bar is one of unquestionable warranty.

The second category comprises the cases which confuse warranties with representations.

Miller v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 216; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. of Maine v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 223, 20 L. ed. 617.

All these cases which fail to distinguish between the principles governing warranties and those governing representations must give way, in this court, before the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is clear in its doctrine that where the matter is a part of the contract "the duty of the court is to enforce it according to its terms." If the statements "are untrue in any respect the policy shall be void." "There is no place for the argument either that the false statement was not material to the risk, or that it was a positive advantage to the company to be deceived by it."

U. S. 835, 28 L. ed. 447; Phania Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Raddin, 120 U. S. 183, 30 L. ed. 644.

The third category comprises cases where the applicant lets the agent of the company fill up the application and then signs without reading. Such cases are not relevant to that at bar, and moreover are expressly discountenanced by the Supreme Court of the United States.

New York L. Ins. Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 29 L. ed. 934.

The fourth category concerns the doctrine of estoppel. This category presents the distinction between the case at bar and every case wherein the question now under consideration has been determined adversely to the company. In every such case the company had received and retained the premium and attempted to raise the question after loss. In every such case the company's position could not be sustained without inflicting an irreparable injury upon the other party.

Bergeron v. Pamlico Ins. & Bkg. Co. 111 N. C. 45.

In the case at bar, on the other hand, the company has tendered back the premium without delay, and during the life of the policy holder, and is seeking to restore him, as well as the company to his original condition. To sustain the company's position is not to injure the other party. To refuse to sustain the company's position imposes upon the company a burden which as between man and man it ought not to bear.

Messrs. Utt Bros. & Michel for appellee.

Caldwell, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity commenced on the 23d of June, 1891, in the United States circuit court for the northern district of Iowa, by the appellant, the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, hereafter called the "Company," against Charles W. Robison, the appellee, to cancel four policies of insurance on the life of the appellee of $5,000 each, issued by the company to him March 17, 1890. The circuit court dismissed the bill for want of equity. The opinion of Judge Woolson is reported in 54 Fed. Rep. 580.

The application for the insurance was taken in Dubuque, Iowa, where the assured then resided, by the agents of the company in that state. The application consists of four parts: First, the application to be signed by the applicant for insurance; second, questions to be asked by the agent and answered by the applicant; third, questions, to be asked by the medical examiner of the company and answered by the applicant, the answers to be written by the examiner; fourth, questions asked the examiner, to be answered by him. A clause of the application expressly provides that the answer to the question which the medical examiner is to ask "must be written by one of the company's examiners," who is instructed to "see that the answers are free from ambiguity, and that diseases are distinguished from mere symptoms," and referring to a long list of diseases, among which is "spitting of blood," he is directed to "ask concerning each and give particulars under head of remarks." The application signed by the assured contains this provision: "I agree that the answers given herewith to the questions of the agent and examiner, which I declare and warrant to be true, shall be the basis of my contract with the company;" and the policies contained this clause: "This policy does not take effect until the first premium shall have been actually paid, nor are agents authorized to make, alter, or discharge this or any other contract in relation to the matter of this insurance, or to waive any forfeiture hereof."

For about three years before the assured was examined, the local agent of the company, Charles J. Brayton, had been soliciting him to take out a policy in the appellant company. The assured finally consented to take out a policy for $5,000, and by direction of the agent went to the office of Dr. G. M. Staples, the medical examiner of the company, to be examined. There he met Brayton, the local agent, T. F. McAvoey, the state agent, and Dr. G. M. Staples, the medical examiner, of the company. It is conceded that these gentlemen were the agents of the company, and there is nothing to show that they were not clothed with all the powers and authority which ordinarily pertain to insurance agents in their respective positions. Dr. Staples had been the medical examiner of the company at Dubuque for twenty-five years. He had also been the family physician of the assured for many years, and had known him from childhood.

The ground set up in the original bill for a cancellation of the policies was that the answer to the fifteenth question asked by the medical examiner was "untrue, false, and fraudulent." An amended bill was filed, alleging that the answer to the eleventh question asked by the medical examiner was false and fraudulent. That question was:

"(a) For what have you sought medical advice during the past seven years? (b) Dates? (c) Duration? (d) Physicians consulted?"

The answer to this question, as written by the medical examiner, was: "(a) Debility from overwork. (b) Feb., 1888. (c) ten days. (d) G. M. Staples." The answer to this question, as given by the applicant, included the name of Dr. M. H. Waples as one of the physicians he had consulted. The fifteenth question was, "Have you ever had any of the following?" Here follow the names of forty diseases, and among them "spitting of blood." To this question the applicant made this answer to the examiner:

"On October 17, 1887, when starting for my office, Dr. S. H. Guilbert, who was attending my wife in her approaching confinement, gave me directions that he would telephone me as soon as I was needed, and to hurry home, bringing with me a prescription of chloroform. I went to my office, buying the chloroform on the way. A little after 2 o'clock, the telephone came for [me] to come instantly. I went to the horse stall in the rear of my office, where I generally kept my horse, and found that some one was using it. I next hurried to the corner of Jones and Main streets, hoping to catch a street-car, and thereby reach my home quickly. I was then living at 1468 Main street. Not finding a street-car in sight, my only recourse was to get home as quickly as my legs would carry me; and I started up Main street, running for a square or two at a time, and then resting by walking for another square, and kept up that pace, coming up Main street on the west side of the street. Between Tenth and Eleventh, on Main street, I crossed the street by running, and about 50 feet from the corner of Eleventh I jumped across the curbstone. As I did so, I tripped on the curb, and fell. I had hardly picked myself up, and started again, when I noticed that I had expectorated a mouthful of blood. As this was the first time I had ever expectorated blood without knowing where it came from, I was very much shocked, and frightened beyond measure. I turned, and ran as fast as I could to the nearest doctor's office, which was Dr. Waples, a square down, and on the opposite side. I went in, found him there, and begged him to tell me what was the matter. He said that I was very much excited; to sit down and try and compose myself; that the blood, probably, did not amount to much. He gave me a drink of water, and tried to soothe my agitation as much as possible. After staying there a short time, and finding that the bloody expectoration had stopped, I started to go home.

After narrating what I have just stated to Dr. Staples, in his office, on the 19th of October, 1887, he began an examination of my throat and lungs. He made what appeared to me a careful examination of my throat and lungs. He said he saw in my throat a dilapidated blood vessel, that looked as if it had bled away. I asked him if, in his opinion, there was any question but that this blood came from this blood vessel in my throat. He assured me that it did not amount to anything, and to go on about my business; that he had similar cases in his office every day,—of perfectly healthy men expectorating blood from their throat."

The applicant having made this answer, Dr. Staples, the medical examiner of the company, himself testifies that:

"I recollect that I told him that the question, 'spitting of blood,' had a definite significance; that it meant hemorrhage from the lungs or bronchial tubes; and that the spitting of blood, as described by him and as known by me, because I was consulted by him, was manifestly not hemorrhage. I explained to him that this question, 'spitting of blood,' was, in my judgment, as medical examiner of the company, put there for the purpose of determining whether there was any evidence of consumption; that the question could not be answered categorically. If you meant spitting of blood from the mouth, probably no person living but what has spit some blood on some occasion, when a tooth has been extracted, or after having the nose-bleed. Spitting of blood did not mean that. It meant as evidence of hæmoptysis, or diseases of the pulmonary organs."

I said that it was not necessary for him to state that he had had spitting of blood; that the question did not imply the spitting of blood, as he had reported it."

And the examiner thereupon directed his son, who was acting as his amanuensis, the examiner himself having pen paralysis, to write the word "No" as the answer to this question, assuring the applicant that that was the proper answer to be drawn from the facts which he had narrated, and which were known to the examiner himself to be true. The applicant at the same time narrated to the local and the state agents of the company all the facts connected with the incident of spitting of blood, as he had stated them to the medical examiner, and asked them if the answer which the examiner had directed him to make to this question was the proper one, and they assured him that it was. The assured, the medical examiner, and the two agents of the company are agreed in their testimony as to what took place. In answer to the question whether he examined the applicant's lungs at the time he examined him for insurance, Dr. Staples says:

"I did as thoroughly as possible; stripping him, and examining him by ear and by use of the stethoscope. I had been Mr. Robison's physician, and had examined him from time to time for various little troubles; and, when I came to examine him for life insurance, I made a most thorough examination of him. I made a more thorough examination of him than of any one. I took three days to satisfy myself about the case, and I positively believe there was no disease of the lungs, and I wanted to satisfy myself whether there was. After making this examination, I came to the conclusion that, so far as his lungs were concerned, they were sound."

So well satisfied were the agents of the company that the assured was a good risk that they pressed the examiner to report him as a preferred risk, which, however, he declined to do; and they persuaded the assured to increase the insurance from $5,000, as originally contemplated, to $20,000.

The assured stated to the examiner and to the agents of the company every fact and circumstance connected with his spitting of blood. He concealed nothing. He added nothing. And the categorical answer to the question which was written down by the examiner was dictated by him, and approved by the two agents. There was no fraud on the part of any one connected with the transaction. The assured, the medical examiner, and the two agents were all acting honestly and in good faith, and the charge in the bill to the contrary is wholly unsupported by the evidence. But it is said, conceding this to be so, that the answer to the question was in fact untrue, and that the assured had no right to rely upon the assurance of the medical examiner and agents of the company that the answer written down by the examiner was a truthful and proper answer, upon the facts narrated by the assured. To support the contention that, upon the facts stated by the assured, the answer to the question was false, the company introduced as a witness its medical director, who testifies that the term "spitting of blood," as contained in the application, "means ejection of blood from the mouth, without reference to the cause or source." But the medical examiner of the company, who examined the applicant and dictated the answer to this question, gives a different definition to the term. Dr. Staples says: "The phrase 'spitting of blood' is, and has been for many years, come to be regarded as synonymous of 'hæmoptysis,' which term is applied to the raising of blood from the lungs,—that is, the bronchial tubes, lungs, or membrane of the lungs,—and not when it comes from any other source."

And, when asked the meaning of the term as used in the application for insurance in this case, he answered: "Blood coming from the lungs or bronchial tubes."

In Quain's Dictionary of Medicine, the term is thus defined: "Spitting of Blood. A proper synonym of 'hæmoptysis.' See 'hæmoptysis.'" "Hæmoptysis. Spitting of blood, having its source in pulmonary or bronchial hemorrhage. The restriction of the term 'hæmoptysis,' as thus defined, has the sanction of long usage and convenience."

In the Century Dictionary the definition is: "Spitting of Blood. Same as 'hemoptysis,' which see." "Hemoptosis. Hemoptysis. In pathol., spitting of blood, usually restricted to raising blood from the lungs."

And see Singleton v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 66 Mo. 63, 27 Am. Rep. 321.

It will be observed that the medical director and the medical examiner of the company differ as to the meaning of the term. It is not necessary for the court to determine which one of these agents of the company gives the right definition, or whether either is right. The fact that they differ shows that the term is ambiguous. It was the medical examiner's duty to ask this question and write down the answer. For this purpose he was the agent of the company, and whatever he said or did in the discharge of this duty was the act of the company. In view of his instructions and the ambiguous character of the question, he was clearly acting within the line of his authority when he assumed to interpret and explain to the applicant the meaning of the question, and to interpret and dictate his answer thereto. His special knowledge of medicine and diseases qualified him to do this. The applicant could not have written the answer to the question, if he had desired to do so. Under the instructions of the company, the answer had to be written by the medical examiner. Upon these facts, the act of the medical examiner was the act of the company, and the answer to this question which he dictated and wrote down must be treated as the answer of the company. The answer which the medical examiner deduced from the facts stated by the applicant was probably the right one; but, assuming that it was not, and that he ought to have written "Yes" instead of "No," the fact remains that it was the answer of the company, and the company is estopped to question the truth of its own answers, notwithstanding the application warrants the answer to be true. The usual clause in an application for insurance to the effect that the applicant warrants his answers to be true does not operate as a limitation or restriction upon the powers of the company's agent. The difference between a warranty and a representation is that a warranty must be literally true, without regard to its materiality to the risk, while a representation must be true only so far as the representation is material to the risk. But this difference does not affect the powers of the company's agents. They remain the same whether the application contains a warranty or only representations, and when the assured, in answer to a question, states the facts fully and truthfully, and the agent of the company, authorized to ask the question and write the answer, putting his own construction upon such facts, deduces therefrom an erroneous answer, which he writes down, assuring the applicant that it is the proper answer upon the facts stated, and the one the company wants, the assured is not estopped by his warranty from showing these facts, and when they are proved they operate to estop the company from questioning the truth of the answer. The same rule obtains where the applicant answers fully and truthfully, and the agent charged with the duty of asking the question and writing down the answer abbreviates the answer or omits part of it, as happened in this case to the answer to the eleventh question. All of the agents agree that in answer to this question the applicant stated distinctly that he had consulted Dr. M. H. Waples and Dr. G. M. Staples. Any other rule would result in holding the applicant responsible for mistakes, oversights, blunders, or omissions of the company's own agent, who was, in the case at bar, indisputably, the full and complete representative of the company in all that was said or done in the medical examination of the applicant.
